His younger sister has also felt the lack of events at UCLA during February. "As a freshman, I was extremely disappointed at the lack of celebration," said Nina Flagg, a first-year undeclared student. "I thought there would be a lot of programs, and other freshmen have noticed as well."

But despite the complaints that events are not occurring on campus, UCLA has hosted events throughout February to celebrate Black History Month. There is currently an art exhibit in Kerckhoff Hall honoring Paul Robeson, an African-American entertainer who sang, danced and wrote. Robeson originated a role in "Show Boat"

On the 10th of February, Roni the "Free Flowin'" Poetri Queen performed for an audience in celebration of Black History Month. During the same week, two speakers on the Pan-African movement stressed the role that African people have played in world civilization and how struggles of African people worldwide are connected.

Perhaps the lack of publicity is the problem, not a lack of events.

Critics of the month itself believe that people only pay attention to African-American history during the month of February, and for the rest of the year it is forgotten. Many African-American critics and students alike believe that this is true.

"It is the whole attitude of just recognizing a month when it should be recognized during a whole year," Holmes said. "When it started, it started for progressive reasons. For African Americans in general, a month is not enough time to celebrate this progress."

Some don't see a promising future for the month if it continues in its current condition.

"I don't think it can go on in this desultory action," Hill said. "There might not even be a need for a Black History Month."

Without the same anticipation and participation on behalf of the students, he feels that the future of this celebration is ambiguous.

But Flagg would like to see Black History Month remain. "There is definitely a need to signify accomplishments as a people," he said.

His younger sister Nina feels that committees should be formed now to commemorate next February. She emphasizes that action should start this year, instead of waiting until the last minute next year.

Today, Israel's 4.8 million Jews are about equally divided between Sephardim and Ashkenazim.

But the stories of humiliation and hardship have been passed down from generation to generation and still shape Sephardic Jews' feelings toward the Ashkenazim, who, despite a certain narrowing of the gaps, remain socially and economically dominant.

Many Sephardim have never overcome their anger over the discrimination they suffered at the hands of the Labor Party establishment that ruled Israel in its formative years, and continue to vote for its political rival, Likud.

"This country was interested in bringing the Jews to Israel but was at a loss as to what to do with all of them once they got here," historian Tom Segev said Wednesday.

Remembering history of oppression

RAZA: Chicanas/os must commemorate long past of subjugation, resistance

By Elias Serna

As the state and media collaborate to manufacture consent for the war against a criminalized Iraq, results show the public's growing trust in a presidency that is "allowed" to cross national borders on missions of conquest. The president is now suddenly supported in declaring devastating wars while his domestic critics are spitefully commanded to "just let the president do his job." Public opinion is actually license to carry out imperialistic aggression globally.

Here in California, the majority of voters (most of whom are white and aging) also support deployments and propositions – no matter how wicked – that will maintain white privilege and "cultural sovereignty" over "conquered lands and people." The ethnic war here, however, targets some of the most politically powerless people: Latino children.

This February marked the 150th anniversary of the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, signed by the Mexican government upon defeat and surrender of almost half its territory. Despite the murderous arrogance of the expanding empire, Mexican diplomats litigated fervently for the cultural and property rights of Mexicans who would be living in what is now the United States' Southwest, also known as "Occupied America" or, to use an indigenous name, Aztlan. To this day, Chicanos and other Latinos have had to fight to protect their rights and ways of life.

As a matter of fact, this month also marks the numbering of Proposition 227 (anti-bilingual education), the latest racist proposition aimed at the Raza community and young people in particular.

Serna is a graduate student in film and television, co-founder of Mal Ojo and supporter of Zapatistas (EZLN).

As some brothers from Dominguez Hills wrote not too long ago, "The white man has not yet proven that he is not our enemy." It is indeed difficult to disagree with this statement. You see, I have a lot of love for my people, but when I face hate every day as I walk the streets, pick up a newspaper or go to school, I have to fight it for my sake as well as those who walk after me.

It is an act basic to human survival. As a matter of fact, the battle for our very assets and distinctions continues and has been at the heart of this 500-year-old struggle to resist the European colonization of our minds and souls.

Reactionary Euro-Americans typically attempt to evade the fact of colonization or attempt to claim that racism is over, and we can now all be "colorblind" (notice the key word is "blind"). In the blinding whiteness of mainstream media, however, Chicanos are invisible, and stereotypes are evidence that some groups need more assimilating and policing than others.

> In the recent multi-faceted attacks on the Raza community, the targets have tended to be children.

In the recent multi-faceted attacks on the Raza community, the targets have tended to be children. The issue has revolved around culture, and the solution lies in policing (the prison complex) and assimilation (i.e. the destruction of culture). This cultural battle boils down to subjugation in the interest of a white capitalist culture.

As events in Chiapas, Mexico, and the criminalization of youth of color in California have demonstrated, killing our people is a business.

Let's face it: Terror is a business. Corporate fat men profit and our communities endure the conditions necessary for the new expansion of capital. Colonization has found new grounds in the '90s.

While supporters of the misleading initiative sponsored by millionaire Ron Unz recruit followers, students, faculty and community members are increasingly looking to the position Chicana/o Studies takes in this climate of fear and aggression. Again the political battle line is drawn between who controls culture and who is affected by these decisions. The latter are increasingly young Raza and people of color.

Like bilingual education, Chicana/o studies was initiated during the high point of the Chicano movement and has since been viewed as a threat by white-run institutions (i.e. the UC Regents). UC administrators are currently accused of distorting history, downsizing Chicana/o studies and other ethnic studies programs, and pursuing a rigid "follow the leader" (or benefactor) faculty buy-off.

Two weeks ago, a turbulent meeting occurred between Chicana/o studies students and the director of the department over the firing of a popular counselor and the departure of two Chicana/o studies librarians. A student stood outside holding a few tattered sheets of paper and pointing his finger to it announced to people walking by, "Look! It's just another broken treaty! They've never signed a treaty they didn't keep!"

The document was the contract then-Chancellor Charles Young signed in June 1993 with hunger strikers after they had fasted for 14 days. After 26 years of denying Chicana/o studies' growth into department status, the Chancellor succeeded in not relinquishing the term "department." However, the "Center for Interdisciplinary Instruction" has all the markings of a department (permanent staff, faculty, hiring and firing power).

The core conflict was the survival of Chicana/o studies beyond UCLA. Los Angeles has a tendency to set precedents. Shutting down the Chicano studies library and dismantling the major at a flagship university like UCLA would have sent green lights across the Southwest to attack all those pesky ethnic studies "liabilities."

In spite of university administration's audacity to hold out for 14 days while Chicano students sacrificed their bodies, media attention and political pressure forced the Chancellor to agree to the students' demands. The large community and

I feel the issue has changed. Before it was more open and now it's more behind closed doors. People are afraid to say what they really want to say. No one really comes out in public.

"Racism is still prominent in our society, but its just a lot more hidden now. There's a lot more people now that are more subtle about what they say. People aren't admitting their racism now like they were thirty years ago."

"I don't think its as prominent in our society. I think its definitely still out there, there's always going to be some people who are afraid to give up on the past, but I don't think it's such a big issue."

The media is often criticized for being too sensationalistic and biased in its reporting. What is the role of mass media? Is the media providing adequate coverage of the issues and events surrounding us? Is the Daily Bruin successfully serving its readers? On March 6, Viewpoint will explore mass media and its role in society. Bring your submissions to 118 Kerckhoff Hall or send e-mail to viewpoint@media.ucla.edu. The deadline is Wednesday, March 4.

The Forum

This forum will uncover the hidden and often inconspicuous forms that racism takes in the '90s. Racism still plays a significant role in American society, yet it has taken on a very different form than it has in the past. Why do many Americans claim that the word racism is over-used? Many ask why racism is such a problem in people's lives, and suggest that they simply 'get over it.' This forum will display various viewpoints on the subject of racism and how it affects different people's lives. Racism is not an easy topic to discuss – it has affected people in ways that many of us can never imagine.

POWER and PRIVILEGE:

WHO'S REALLY GOT IT?

Racism only exists when one has prejudice and the power to act upon it, not when one group's opportunities are dominated by another

By Michael Schwartz

Psychologist Beverly Tatum once made this analogy about racism in America: "I sometimes visualize the ongoing cycle of racism as a moving walkway at the airport. Active racist behavior is equivalent to walking fast on the conveyor belt. The person engaged in active racist behavior has identified with the ideology of white supremacy and is moving with it. Passive racist behavior is equivalent to standing still on the walkway.

"No overt effort is being made, but the conveyor belt moves the bystanders along to the same destination as those who are actively walking. Some of the bystanders may feel the motion of the conveyor belt, see the active racists ahead of them, and choose to turn around, unwilling to go to the same destination as the white supremacists. But unless they are walking actively in the opposite direction at a speed faster than the conveyor belt – unless they are actively anti-racist – they will find themselves carried along with the others."

Let me tell you a little bit about myself. A little bit about my past and what my life is like today.

When I was 13 years old, my father died. For those of you who don't know what it's like to lose a parent at such a crucial age I'm glad you don't. Two weeks later my grandfather also passed away. This made my mother a single parent. A single parent living on welfare. My mom has multiple sclerosis and is unable to work or walk. How did this affect me? I flunked my entire freshman year. I joined a gang and spent my time hustling in pool halls or hanging out on the corner drinking. My mom couldn't control me. I had the opportunity to do anything and everything I wanted to. I did just that. Obviously things changed. Otherwise I wouldn't be here writing about this now. Thanks to welfare my mother and I survived. Thanks to affirmative action I'm at UCLA today.

Racism very much exists in America, and it must be unlearned the same way it was learned. If you want an example of racism, here's one: Any white person, who upon reading this thought I was black or Latino, there's your racism. I'm a white male. White males and white females are entitled to privilege every day of our lives. We have the privilege to be classified as individuals, whereas people of color are considered just as one group. Many believe that only minorities are on welfare, and that the minorities are the ones who kept your friends from being admitted into college.

What's the difference between prejudice and racism? Racism is prejudice plus power. I'm sure many will agree that everyone has certain prejudices, but only the white people have the power – 98.6 percent of top-level jobs in this country are held by white males. Hence, only whites can be racist. I want you to recognize your privilege because if you're white you have it. Don't even mention "reverse racism;" it doesn't exist. To inflict racism, you need power; minorities don't have power. I'll be the first one to admit I'm a racist. I'm white and I'm prejudiced! That's all you need.

You want to know my privilege? I'm the one who's on welfare, and I'm the one who got into UCLA because of affirmative action. Yet my best friend, who's a middle-class Mexican, and had almost a 4.0 GPA and a 1310 on his SAT's will get blamed as the one who took your friend's spot and is taking your tax dollars.

Racism isn't about the Klansmen, it's about us. It's the system, which is designed to keep people of color down. It's a system in which cops pull people over because they're black, and people don't even get applications to jobs because of their skin color. The problem is we don't realize that racism is our problem, not their problem. If we as white people don't do something about racism,

> The problem is we don't realize that racism is our problem. If we as white people don't do something ... nothing will ever change.

nothing will ever change. People of color have done everything they can to educate the white people about themselves and their culture. They're tired and they deserve a rest. Now we must pick up the fight. If we don't, the cycle will continue. Racism is very covert today, but you need to be aware of it. Reread the quote at the beginning. Where do you see yourself on that walkway? Are you moving forward? Are you standing still? Most people are. Or are you walking the other way? If you're walking the other way, be prepared to bump into a lot of people moving for-

Concept of race creates artificial social divisions

IDENTITY: Return to childhood's innocence; re-learn to see people as unique, equal individuals

By Daniel Rego

Race is the most putrid and hate-inspiring word ever spoken. Racism is the belief of one race's superiority over another. Some believe racism involves only one or two races against the others, but this claim ignores the core problem. The core problem is the very concept of race itself. Those who stress race above all are the root causes of racism in America and elsewhere in the world. When people are classified by their racial identity, they are separate, divided and different. Separate is inherently unequal. Some race-conscious individuals say racial classifications are inherent in everyone. They are not inherent, for the concept of race is artificial. Perhaps it can just be forgotten to history, so that we don't look at people in terms of race anymore. This is not a dream, it can happen. I cite my own childhood as an example.

When I was growing up, I had no concept of race as some magical thing which forever divided people up. Some may call this ignorance, but I call it innocence and purity of youth. On my street there lived a particular girl who just happened to be black. Once, we were bickering about something inconsequential as children occasionally do. I noticed that she was wearing a sweatshirt that had a map of Africa, in "African Nationalism" colors. I was a bit of a "geography buff" and the kids on my street knew this. So to be smart, I said, "At least I don't wear stupid maps of random continents on my clothes." She burst into rage and put me in a headlock (I never claimed to be a workout buff). For the life of me I didn't know why she erupted!

When I was in junior high, I realized that one boy whom I had known since age 7 or 8 happened to be Asian. Even then, I thought of the Asian students as friends just like any other students. It was no big deal. I remember that many of my friends were Hispanic. It never crossed my mind to look at them that way. They were diverse individuals, not racial classifications to me. I remember when Proposition 187 passed while I was in high school. There were some Hispanic groundskeepers and teachers, but I never connected these individuals (mostly Americans, as far as I knew) to immigration. There was one teacher, though, that we did lightly joke about. We said the INS labor support were the keys to this victory.

The situation was an intense lesson in dealing with powerful elitist organizations that attempt to maintain racial and class privileges that have been passed down for over 500 years. The victory also brought more responsibility and a sense of ownership to the Chicano community in the shaping of its cultural destiny.

In spite of – and also because of – the anti-Latino political climate today, we must look to the historical role of our culture and the resistance and organization we as a community have put up in defense of our culture.

The time has perhaps come for Raza to change our attitude about ourselves – that there is no apologizing for who we are, no turning back on our human rights to culture and no turning back the clock. A new sun is upon us and our culture of resistance and affirmation must lead us forward.

> Media attention and political pressure forced the Chancellor to agree to the students' demands.

Instead of losing a language, let us look to expand our culture. Bilingual education programs should be bolstered and improved, and perhaps it is time for all young Chicano and Raza youth – not just those who manage to attain an increasingly elitist higher education – to know their own history and receive more accurate and informed lessons about their culture. Instead of losing our language, we should offer our young people courses that speak directly to their experiences with curriculum that is directly drawn from our history.

Instead of eliminating bilingual education, maybe it's time we introduce Chicana/o studies to all people and especially to the people who need it most: Raza youth in middle schools and high schools.

Much like the assimilationist campaigns of the '80s (English Only, "the Decade of the Hispanic") the current racist political attack on Raza children is bound to produce more problems and turmoil than solutions.

> Instead of eliminating bilingual education, maybe it's time we introduce Chicana/o studies to all people.

The community and those who stand by the oppressed in their quest for liberation will and must do as much as they can, just as their ancestors have done over centuries past: organize, resist and fight with whatever means necessary for the lives of our youth and those who will come after us. Instead of attacking the future of California, why not let the indigenous cultures live, breathe and learn freely?

Chicano culture is unique, intense and indigenous to the long and complicated history of these lands. So the next time you display your rich culture and someone sneers that they do not speak Spanish, simply respond, "It's not my problem."

was coming and dragging her off – she was from Germany, and was in reality a very nice teacher. I am the type of person who associated the English with foreign while not thinking the same about Hispanics and Asians that I knew! Once, I learned that this one girl I knew was three-fourths Comanche. At the time I found this to be a little interesting, but gave it very little thought for the rest of the years which I knew her.

This way of looking at people of various races was completely alien to me until I came to UCLA! Here I find racial SAGs (Student Advocacy Groups) shouting mantras about racial unity. Here I have found hatred in people's voices (of ALL races). It is not ironic that the place that shouts out equality and justice the most turns out to be the most hate-filled? The more race is stressed, the greater the racism spews forth. The secret to ending racism is so clear! We must abandon this classification of race, and look at ourselves and others as the individuals that we are, as the children unsullied by this world do!

Did you know there are laws in this country that are only used against blacks, Latinos and Asians? Just because you don't burn crosses or use the word nigger doesn't make you free of racism.

We are racist, but we have the power to change things. I know what you're thinking: what the hell does that mean? It means you need to recognize your racist sentiments and your privilege. Stop blaming people of color for your problems, stop telling jokes about others, and > Remember one thing – you need to change yourself before you change the world ... All I can ask is that you look deep inside yourself.

check your beliefs. The next time you hear a racist joke, or racist remarks, don't let them slide by unchallenged. If you notice that you got served before the person of color next to you, say something. Speak up! Racism must be unlearned the same way it was learned. And if you thought I was black, or Latino, or had any thoughts about me at the beginning of this, you are in need of some unlearning. We all are. Don't fool yourself into thinking racism is when someone's called a nigger. Remember one thing: You need to change yourself before you can change the world. It all starts with you. All I can ask is that you look deep inside yourself and realize some things. Realize that racism exists and it is powerful. Realize that if you're white you are racist. I'm sorry if it hurts, but it's true. Realize you're entitled to so much privilege just for being white.

Thank you for listening: it's just the first step. I hope if anything you won't only look at blacks and Latino's as the people who "stole your friend's spot," because it just might have been me. I hope you don't think it's "those minorities" on welfare, because you know what? It's me.

The Nikkei Student Union's Japanese Culture Night showcases modern and traditional aspects of Japanese-American culture

By Louise Chu
Daily Bruin Contributor

There is a calm and relaxed atmosphere in the Veterans Wadsworth Theater on Monday night. It's relatively quiet for a rehearsal – quiet enough for several people scattered around the theater to catch up on midterm studies or even catch a few Zs in preparation for the busy week ahead. You would never know that in just a few days, they would be putting on their biggest event of the year – the culmination of 10 long months of hard work.

The members of the Nikkei Student Union (NSU) are anxiously preparing for their annual culture show, which will take place in the Wadsworth Theater on Saturday night. Beneath all the laughing and casual banter, there is an underlying tension, felt especially by the directors, all of whom have put in countless hours preparing for the show.

"It's very life-consuming," says Cindy Yoshiyama, one of the four directors. "Almost every waking hour is spent thinking about what needs to be done. There's lighting, there's sound, there's props, there's blocking the scenes and writing it."

"We've had days where we literally ran all day – 12-hour days," adds director Naoya Imanishi. "When we had regular schedules, we had eight hours a week of practice on average, but that's just working with the actors. Outside, the directors all have to coordinate about six hours a week. I don't know if that's a lot – it feels like a lot."

The show was difficult to coordinate because the directors decided to experiment with a new format this year. The theme of this year's show is unity within the Japanese-American community, and this idea was appropriately reflected in the shift from the format of a variety show to that of one cohesive play.

Within the general play, titled "Mochi Ice Cream," there are several music and dance acts that are normally separate from the drama. The show will begin with NSU Kyodo Taiko, the only act not incorporated into the show, that involves a group of students playing Japanese drums. It will also include the Koto Ensemble, the playing of a Japanese, harp-like instrument. There are also two traditional Odori dances, in which a group of women dance in long, multi-colored robes called yukatas, and an Obon dance.

"For the first time in (NSU) Culture Night history, everything has been integrated into one whole show. I think that makes it a really strong show altogether. It flows really nicely," Yoshiyama emphasizes.

Mary Kay Tsuji, the executive director, points out another difference. "It's going to be a more of a 'back-to-the-roots' kind of thing. It's going to be a lot more 'culturous' this year than it has in the past, or at least last year."

Year after year, one of the most popular parts of the show is the modern dance, which has seen several changes this year as well.

"First of all, (the choreographers) all have different styles, so it's a new thing for me to be working with people with different backgrounds that specialize in

House of Blues brunch offers feast for both body and soul

RESTAURANT: Southern cuisine, gospel unites religion with community

By Vanessa VanderZanden
Daily Bruin Staff

We all know where to go to get the best pizza deal in town. And many have become familiar with the hottest night spots. But does anyone know where they can go to praise Jesus and enjoy chicken jambalaya, all in one sitting?

The House of Blues provides just this atmosphere every Sunday for their Gospel Sunday Brunch. The $26 event requires advance phone reservations but makes available a service at 9 a.m., 12 p.m. and 2:30 p.m. A different local gospel group entertains weekly as patrons finish up the variety of southern treats served buffet-style from the club floor.

Following true down-home tradition, the converted night club lines the dance pit with rows of tables and fills the remaining walkways with various food selections. And, with the shamble-shack interior of the House of Blues, it isn't difficult to imagine oneself lingering in the bayou, desiring only eggs, bacon and religion to remain content.

As patrons finish up the last of their toppling plates, ... Sylvia St. James sings with the rumble of God in her belly.

But the House of Blues offers more than a two-bit, mom-and-pop stop in the way of southern cuisine. Chefs create made-to-order omelettes at two separate stations, while a central bar offers a Seattle scramble, a southern hash, corn bread with maple butter and a spicy chicken jambalaya. Cheese, grits and bacon accompany a mixed vegetable dish.

But that's not all. An entire salad bar, with choice of a Chinese chicken, pasta, fruit or make-it-yourself Cobb salad offer a lighter selection. Meanwhile, baby croissants, bagels (with all the fixin's), seasoned fish and jumbo shrimp with cocktail sauce lure feasters from the opposite wall.

Also, one chef slices two hunks of quality meat with several sauce options nearby. And, to top it off, a dessert station provides a succulent breaded pudding with whisky sauce, as well as a strawberry or banana shortcake. The bottomless glasses of juice and coffee arrive via the friendly servers after you've taken a seat.

The staff, who couldn't make the event more friendly if they tried, provide the sort of community flavor a Gospel Sunday Brunch should offer. Some kids dressed in nice clothes look with wide eyes upon the food selections, while a few young, chic, L.A. couples sip Bloody Marys, adding the perfect off-set to the wide range of

"Dark City"
Directed by Alex Proyas
Starring Rufus Sewell, Kiefer Sutherland, Jennifer Connelly and William Hurt

Here's one for the "X-Files" reject bin. Although "Dark City" captures the right murky and paranoid atmosphere, Mulder and Scully would be lost in this world. The pleasure of the film relies heavily on grandiose visuals, but in regards to a coherent plot line, "Dark City" leaves the audience in the dark.

"Dark City" claims to be a psychological sci-fi thriller, but the film doesn't involve the audience's minds enough to be psychologically effective, nor is it that thrilling either. The plot attempts to be clever, intricate and multi-dimensional (unfortunately, qualities not extended to the lead characters) but just ends up muddled and confusing.

John Murdoch (Rufus Sewell) wakes up in a bathtub to discover that he's wanted for a series of brutal murders. But he can't remember if he committed them or not. As Murdoch seeks to unravel this clichéd mystery, he learns that his world is actually created and controlled by bald supernatural beings, uninspiringly named The Strangers. Headed by the fearsome Mr. Book (Ian Richardson) these alien Strangers use their special powers of sheer will to mix and match the city inhabitants' memories and, therefore, their identities. The film trusts the audience to suspend logic and connect this impractical plan to The Strangers' quest of unlocking the secrets of the human soul.

Strap on those wings, folks, because viewers will be doing a lot of logical leaping throughout this film. For example, the fiendish characters are powerful enough to eradicate the sun, leaving the city in perpetual darkness but somehow can't overpower Murdoch, the only man who could possibly challenge them.

If the audience ignores the inconsistencies, the eye-capturing special effects and stylish '40s-era set designs are dynamic enough to excite the senses. The expert use of lighting and set construction give "Dark City" a noir-ish, Gotham-City undertone. The spectacle of the buildings morphing are also definite scene-stealers.

British actor Sewell also has a strong screen presence. The rest of the cast includes Kiefer Sutherland overacting as an excitable scientist, William Hurt as the good cop and Jennifer Connelly, who brings sweetness and sensuality to her role as Murdoch's wife, Emma.

Optically-fixated filmgoers may delight in the engrossing visuals. However, while Murdoch desperately strives to recover his stolen memory, many filmgoers will have to forget about logical reasoning to enjoy this dim cinematic experience.

"Kissing a Fool"
Directed by Doug Ellin
Starring David Schwimmer, Jason Lee, Mili Avital and Bonnie Hunt

For awhile romantic comedies seemed to be doomed to such brainless pieces of crap like "Addicted to Love" and "She's the One." But "Kissing a Fool," set in the beautiful, postcard-perfect Chicago, makes being cute and corny fun and watchable again. It revives your faith in the goofiness and joy of falling in love (in a movie).

Jay (Jason Lee), a sensitive and extremely self-aware writer, and Max (David Schwimmer), a womanizing television sports reporter, have been friends for years. But their love lives couldn't be more different. While Jay has been pining away for the same bitch girlfriend who had been cheating on him for years (he even ran away to Europe and wrote a whole novel on the God-awful experience), Max goes through women like a child collecting beanie babies.

But all their notions of love change when Jay introduces Max to his pretty and intelligent book editor, Sam (Mili Avital). Max and Sam immediately fall for each other, and before you can say "romantic tension," they're engaged and moving in together. But ladies' man Max is soon getting a little paranoid about the whole commitment thing and wonders if Sam is truly the last woman he ever wants to sleep with. So he convinces Jay to test Sam to make sure she wouldn't cheat on him. But as Jay begins to spend more time with Sam, he starts to fall for her and she with him. One of the funniest and most romantic scenes in the movie is when the romantic triangle finally comes to a head over dinner at Sam's house, and everyone tries to figure out who's testing who now.

While the commercials might fool cynical people into thinking this is another dumb romantic comedy, the witty writing and energetic performances elevate this movie to the level of such other successful romances like "When Harry Met Sally" and "Jerry Maguire."

Schwimmer plays the shmarmy bastard role quite well, although at some points of the movie, you'll want to shout out, "Stop being so mean, Ross!" But Lee steals the picture with his completely adorable performance as the "sensitive guy" who gets so guilty over deceiving his friends that he can't eat. While Lee's previous performances in the Kevin Smith movies show that he can play a sarcastic loudmouth, this movie shows how he can play the wide-eyed romantic quite convincingly. All the women in the audience will want to take him home with them after this movie.

"O Amor Natural"
Directed by Heddy Honigmann

"The ass, how cute. Always smiling, never tragic. Couldn't care less what's round the front. The ass is self-sufficient. Is there anything else?"

Actually there is something else to those seemingly crass lines. In its truest form, sex is a part of love, and in Heddy Honigmann's new documentary "O Amor Natural," she's out to prove it. But not in the conventional sense. With a book of erotic poetry under her arm, she has taken to the streets of Rio de Janeiro to find out what the people think.

The poetry is taken from a collection written by one of Brazil's most reknowned poets, Carlos Drummond de Andrade. Drummond's book, from which the movie was named, was published posthumously because Drummond believed that they would have been perceived as pornographic. With subjects ranging from oral and anal sex to let's-do-it-on-the-floor-because-we-can't-wait sex, Drummond's poems certainly come under the category of erotic. As for pornographic, Honigmann leaves it for others to decide.

After reciting the poems, most of the participants, in their 60s, 70s and 80s, don't think the verse is pornographic at all, but highly erotic and sensual. At first, many of them read Drummond's verses enthusiastically and comment on the beauty of the poems.

But instead of simply having the elderly analyzing poetry, "O Amor Natural" that lets the older generation remember their past sexual escapades, and the results are quite often hilarious and touching.

To most, the words "elderly" and "sex" don't really go together. They were doing it back then. The interviewees casually recollect fond memories of their more virile past. A man in his 80s surrounded by members of his family talks about how throughout his 50-year marriage, he had many infidelities. But his wife tolerated him because she loved him.

In one of the funniest scenes, an older woman discusses how after finding pleasure in sex, she needed to be taken violently because, in her words, "I am violent." "None of that softy crap," she says. Then an elderly couple reads a poem about making love on the floor, having a good laugh. Feeling the filmmaker's embarrassment, the lady says, "We're old. We're not dead."

"O Amor Natural" doesn't just document poetry analysis by our older citizens. Nor does it try to make fun of them by showing them say words like vulva and penis on camera. It shows how love, happiness and passion is felt through sex. And though once we get older, it becomes harder to maintain the sensuality, the memories and feelings still remain.

Scoring at the movies

Ranging from classical to pop, film soundtracks evoke emotional responses and bring in a few extra bucks in the process

By Ai Goldsmith
Daily Bruin Contributor

Although we live in the age of science and technology, people are looking to extract emotion from almost every experience. Such desire for emotional rapport has led movies like "Titanic" to the top of the charts – but the ship doesn't sink there.

The mind boggling success of "Titanic" in the box office is mirrored by the record industry as well. So far, about five million copies of the soundtrack grace the lives of "Titanic" fans in the United States, with sales over 10 million reported around the world. "Titanic's" success on the record charts is a prime example of the rising popularity of soundtracks.

According to Len Lovallo, regional product manager for Blockbuster Music, popularity of a soundtrack often depends on the impact the movie had on the audience.

"People are so impacted by a movie (like 'Titanic') that they just have to have the soundtrack," Lovallo says.

In the case of "Titanic," the movie's success, and the effect on the audience, comes from the dramatic and passionate story of two lovers, Jack and Rose. Yet the story may not have been as believable or exciting if it weren't for James Horner's score.

"The score to 'Titanic' made the love story believable because it was about love songs," says film composer and UCLA professor Paul Chihara.

Chihara, who has taught distinguished film composers including John Williams ("E.T." and "Star Wars"), explains that the purpose of underscore (the background music) in movies is to add emotional depth to the film.

"(Film music) is about emotion, about making the story memorable," Chihara says. "We go away from a movie moved by emotion – not information. When we talk about 'Titanic,' we don't say that we learned that the ship went down in 1920. We already knew that. But we didn't know that we cared about those characters and that we would go on caring about them. That's what music does ... it makes you care."

The music in "Titanic" is certainly not the only score that has made a movie memorable. Other soundtracks from successful movies like

The sound of music brings movies to life

COLUMN: Soundtracks can complete a film, or be its only redeeming quality

Mike Prevatt

I own over 45 soundtracks. I have to admit, that number wouldn't be quite so high had I not started writing for The Bruin, where countless publicists throw their soundtracks at us as they hope for the almighty Sound Bites coverage.

Somehow, though, I've become a bit of a collector. Maybe it was because of The Bruin. Maybe it came about from my broadening music tastes. Maybe I felt competitive with the girlfriend of one of my best friends, who also collects soundtracks.

But I like to think that I have so many film scores and soundtracks thanks to the movies themselves.

I'm not much of a film buff, to be quite honest. I do own a mean movie collection, but I'm sure I'm missing a lot of the "classics" that just plain bore me (i.e. "Dazed and Confused"). For me, most of the emotion I extract from any given movie comes from the music. The musical component of any film is what heightens the emotion and mood of the movie. From horror movies (who, besides I, will be forever scarred by that haunting string composition from "The Shining"?) and adventure movies, to Disney movies and comedies, it's the music, for me, that makes a movie unique and full of feeling.

All my favorite movies have incredible scores/soundtracks that beautifully match the emotion of the movie. The over-the-top heroism of the "Star Wars" scores. The hip yet stark sounds from the "Trainspotting" album. The ambient and spiritual aura of Peter Gabriel's score for "The Last Temptation of Christ." And I think that most tend to do this sort of thing ... y'know, get the soundtracks to movies that moved us.

Take this whole "Titanic" hype. Can you believe how many copies of James Horner's score are selling? Even though 850,000 copies sold (last week) is, like, rare, I can believe it. First of all, the nation's top single, Celine "Pomeranian Face" Dion's "My Heart Will Go On," is featured on the instrumental-heavy album. Good move, Sony. Second, the score has Celtic/Irish influences throughout the album, and that sort of New Age-type of music is really popular right now – just look at how popular Enya is. I tend to think the genre helps people relax, but that's just my theory.

And lastly, maybe most importantly, people are in love with that damn movie, and with that music they are able to relive those intense moments of danger and romance. I can't even count how many women I know have admitted to buying that soundtrack because of its dead-on musical expressions of a love nobody in reality experiences.

Search for 'The Real Blonde' leaves no feelings unmoved

FILM: Ironic humor, sympathy evoke insight on characters in pursuit of perfection in world

By Michelle Nguyen
Daily Bruin Contributor

In today's fast-paced superficiality of organic coffee and drive-thru dry cleaners, there is still truth and beauty.

Our modern artist is Tom DiCillo, and his new film, "The Real Blonde," is his muse. DiCillo has created a comedy using New York's entertainment and fashion industry as its backdrop. The sad, but deeply human subjects of his comedy are players in this industry – products of a society whose emphasis lies in pursuing goals empty-handed.

"It's one thing to strive for things. It's another to strive for it and not have a sense of yourself while you're doing it," says Elizabeth Berkley, who stars in the film. "Now, taking that serious note and spinning it around on its head is what Tom DiCillo does so well."

The currents of sarcastic wit and sympathy that mark DiCillo's style in "Living in Oblivion" and "Box of Moonlight" continue to run through "The Real Blonde."

"He and his wicked sense of humor poke fun of not only the industry, but humanity. But it also shows the heart too," Berkley says.

No person is too cool to be spared in "The Real Blonde." DiCillo has Steve Buscemi step down from the altar of independent films to play a cameo as an outlandish, ego-heavy music-video director.

"(Buscemi's) character is kinda pissed off that he's an indie filmmaker, and now he's doing a video. You know, his snobbish attitude," Berkley says. "So (the film) pokes fun at ego."

With the national wrath for her feature film debut in "Showgirls" behind her, Berkley herself is cast as a struggling, fragile actress hoping for exposure as a Madonna body double.

The players in this tragic comedy are young, pretty people who are struggling to do something with their lives. There is Joe (Matthew Modine), an actor who still does not want to compromise himself by pursuing demeaning parts. Mary (Catherine Keener), Joe's live-in lover, relentlessly tries to free her male-directed hostilities by going to her sleazy shrink and her self-defense class, taught by Doug (Denis Leary).

DiCillo chooses a slice-of-life approach that is akin to Robert Altman's. This rhythmic, fast-paced approach might reflect DiCillo's worries that people's lives have been reduced to sound bites.

The title of the film comes from the story line of Joe's fellow actor-waiter, Bob (Maxwell Caulfield) who is in pursuit of the "real blonde," a true golden girl who doesn't get her blonde from a bottle. The directions of his pursuit aim at his soap opera co-star, Kelly (Daryl Hannah) and the supermodel Sahara (Bridgette Wilson).

"The fact that there's only a certain caliber of woman that (Bob's) prepared to commit to means that he does have an easy get-out each and every time," Caulfield says. "I think the guy is close to approaching some kind of sexual burnout, and we witness it in the movie."

During his incessant search for the real blonde, one must wonder if any of Bob's candidates are real blondes. Caulfield can only lay claim to Daryl Hannah's status as a blonde. Smirking widely, Caulfield says, "I'm the only person that can actually answer that question because umm ... The script originally called for her to flash the camera. I was the only person privy to that, and I think it's so obvious Daryl Hannah's a blonde, but I definitely had the Cadbury seat on that one."

Paramount
Matthew Modine and Elizabeth Berkley star in "The Real Blonde."

On a serious note though, the phrase "the real blonde" provides a larger metaphor for the whole lot of society who strives for an invisible perfection.

"I think America is becoming a cartoon society," Caulfield says. "We are looked upon as the society that has its act most together ... and yet we are getting more and more caught up with image and perception as opposed to reality and facts. Without getting too heavy about it Tom's got an interesting viewpoint on it. It is something to poke fun at."

DiCillo does paint a world of colorfully ludicrous characters, but his film is hardly a scathing indictment of their world. He shows them in a purely human light, synchronically sympathizing and taunting.

"The one thing the English used to accuse America of is having no sense of irony. I think that's really coming along really fast in America," observes Caulfield, a born and bred Englishman. "I once asked my mother to define irony, and she said it's laughing with tears in your eyes, and I think the movie does that."

DiCillo's sympathetic sentiments are epitomized in a scene where Sahara (Bridgette Wilson), a blonde supermodel, has bruises on her face from Bob's beating. Her photographer (Marlo Thomas), ecstatic with her genius and artistry, decides that Sahara should pose as is, adorned with bruises, lingerie and snakes.

Wilson felt self-consciously weird when she was actually doing the photo shoot, but the impact of the image really hit hard when she actually saw the dailies.

"When I was watching the photo shoot, it was so sad to me because, first of all, the issue of what really happened to her is sort of skirted throughout the entire movie, which I think is how oftentimes it's dealt with," Wilson says.

In the film, this photo of Sahara was turned into an advertisement, a biting sign that some "artists" think this brand of sad beauty does sell.

FILM: "The Real Blonde" opens today.

different things," explains choreographer Christie Kawada. "I specialize in ballet and jazz. Rawlins (Apilado) is totally more hip-hop. Will (Tanaka) is more freestyle ... And another thing that we did differently this year was that we added in Japanese pop music, which was never done before, so we added in something that mixes Japanese culture with modern dance."

Many admit that the modern dance is their favorite part of the show, while some are partial to Taiko and Odori.

"Every year it's different. Last year, I liked the drama, but I think this year it's going to be pretty well balanced. I don't really have a favorite," Shintani admits.

The divergent personal tastes of those involved in the show have not diminished the common goal of Culture Night in general, which is to celebrate the Japanese-American culture. Besides this common goal of everyone in NSU, this show has a personal meaning for each individual involved, whether it be the joy of performing or the satisfaction of learning about a new culture.

"Since I'm a fourth-generation, Japanese American and I never had much of a connection with the Japanese-American community, this has given me a chance to see all the Odori dancing and the modern dancing and the play, telling about Little Tokyo," says performer Jenny Yutani.

"It's been a real learning experience, not only learning about my heritage but also participating in and learning the dances, learning my lines. It's really fun," says actor and dancer Brian Nagami.

"My goal is to say thank you to the community; thank you to my parents for teaching me so much culture," Tsuji says.

The show has an especially personal meaning for Linda Osako, the choreographer of the Odori dances.

"The second (Odori) song has more meaning for me because I dedicated it to my brother, whom I lost recently. It's dedicated to him and everybody else who's lost someone."

Ultimately, the objective of the show is to promote and display Japanese-American culture in an effort to not only teach others, but also to bring the Japanese-American community together.

"I want (the audience) leaving the theater thinking, 'Wow, that's what Japanese culture's all about. That's what it means to be Japanese,'" Tsuji says. "All of us up there aren't all Japanese obviously. But we all share it; it's the beauty of another custom and another tradition ... There's so much stuff that's there, and we just want to share it with everybody."

CULTURE: NSU Culture Night takes place Saturday at 7 p.m. at the Veterans Wadsworth Theater. Admission is free, but tickets must be obtained from the Central Ticket Office. For tickets, call (310) 825-2101. For more information, call (310) 284-4650.

ages taking part in the feast.

As patrons finish up the last of their toppling plates, the background music of recorded choirs is replaced with live voices. The curtains open and out steps host Sylvia St. James, alongside the Compton-based group The Starlights. The revival has just begun.

Bursting out of her tight, long white lace dress and matching wide-brimmed church hat, St. James sings with the rumble of God in her belly. She implores the audience to throw their hands in the air and clap along. Soon, the House is quaking.

Head singer of The Starlights Greg Botts takes over vocals after a few shared selections. His black vest and pants with blousy undershirt match those of his band of performers. Shaking and straining every vocal chord in his throat to create the powerful spirituals, it would be a surprise if the heavens didn't part just to hear Botts' performance.

> Botts prompting the audience ... reveals the community nature of the southern religious experience.

Most selections have Botts prompting the audience to clap along, revealing the community nature of the southern religious experience. Likewise, St James has the less than touchy-feely crowd clenching hands with their fellow diners during one spiritually passionate song. And the final piece provides an opportunity for all birthday boys and girls to sing along the chorus to "In the Army of the Lord" on stage after "Sliver" (1993), "Showgirls" (1995), and "Jade" (1995), we all sort of figured that we knew what was coming next.

But it wasn't "Burn Hollywood Burn," a film about a disgruntled director whose been used and abused by his producer, his studio president and even his actors. Shot almost entirely with actors talking directly into the camera, this mockumentary-style film tells the story of film editor Alan Smithee (Eric Idle) who is hired to direct a big-budget action film because he is viewed by studio executives as controllable.

When the action film, starring Whoopi Goldberg, Sylvester Stallone and Jackie Chan as three bad-ass cops, is finished, Smithee finds that not only isn't it his work, but that it is terrible.

Most directors who find themselves in this position have the option of using a pseudonym specified in 1969 by the Directors Guild of America. Unfortunately for Smithee, the preselected pseudonym is "Alan Smithee." Unable to remove his name from the film, he steals the movie and threatens to burn it if he cannot have final editing rights. In the meantime, he hides out with his new negotiators, independent film makers Coolio and Chuck D.

"Parking in South Central is worse than in Westwood," Smithee observes.

Unfortunately, the story line turns out to be more interesting than the movie.

Despite several dialogues which Hollywood insiders and movie buffs are sure to find amusing, and several more which residents of the West Side will undoubtedly appreciate, the mockumentary style ultimately serves to bog the film down with a tedious and sleep-inducing pace.

And just as a reminder that this truly is an Ezsterhas film, all of the women in the movie play objects, and all of the African Americans play "black people." It is occasionally moderately funny, usually offensive and almost never redeeming.

This movie is a definite rental.

PREVATT

For me, I thought the score was just beautiful. I don't buy very many scores, because I'm more of a "red guitar, three chords and the truth" kinda guy, but James Horner does a great job of evoking soul-searching emotion. He also composed the scores to "Braveheart" and "Legends of the Fall." It's like the only "classical" kind of music I can really appreciate and stomach for more than five minutes. Isn't that sad?

As soon as I saw "Titanic," I went out and scoured the music stores for the soundtrack. I'm not much of a rush-out-and-buy person, except for when one of my favorite artists releases a new album and I'm there the first day, but I had to have this album. It took me a week and a half to find it. Everyone was sold out, and this was before "Titanic" the album was even in the Billboard Top 10! When our own Penny Lane had it (amazing, considering they don't have much else anymore), I got excited and bought it!

I feel kinda silly about the whole thing. I totally got bitten by the "Titanic" album bug. I mean, I'm not one for real schmaltzy music, and it's hardly the alt-rock or Britpop kinda thing I usually lust over. But it's the emotion behind the music, the memories of the power of the movie, that draws us to buy this sort of album.

Another example: "Trainspotting." I saw this movie four times in the movie theaters. This movie just rocked my world. As soon as I saw it, I bum rushed the nearest Tempo records and snatched up a copy of its soundtrack. Songs like "Perfect Day" by Lou Reed and Blur's "Sing" made me relive the alienation themes of the movie, which serve as great wallowing songs when you've got the El Niño blues. And then songs like Underworld's top electro-dance anthem, "Born Slippy," gets me all revved up, like Renton when he snatched the money from Begbie's hands and took off, a whole new world of possibilities lying ahead of him. (Hmmm, maybe I'll be Obi-Wan for the next 'Star Wars' movie.)

And I know a lot of people who got the soundtrack bought it right after seeing the movie. I have five friends that bought it within a few days of seeing the movie. I think that's so cool. I'm sure EMI/Capitol records thinks that's cool, too!

Not every soundtrack I get gives me some emotional rush. Sometimes you just need a good music compilation or a soothing score to mellow out to.

Most soundtracks make great compilation records. The albums for "Clueless" and "Great Expectations" are cool examples. Both really have a feel for the moods of those respective movies. However, to have all those random, cool tunes on the same album is both economically and aesthetically pleasing. Now I don't have to scope out the singles and separate albums for the songs I dig on those albums. Sweet deal.

There's even movies that I've never seen, but I bought the soundtrack anyway because the music was so good. The classic score to "The Mission," composed by Ennio Morricone, is one example. The techno-laden soundtrack to "The Saint" is another. (I can't bring myself to watch Val Kilmer movies ... it's like being pretentious is second nature to him.) Even though I haven't seen either movie, I can still get a true feel of what the movie is like. That makes a great film album.

And then there's good soundtracks to bad movies. This is the one redeeming thing about stinker flicks. Take "Grosse Point Blank." I'm going to get flak for this: I hated it. What a boring piece of gobshite, as they say in England. But as I tried to get through the movie, I noticed that the music in the movie, the '80s New Wave and post-punk songs from bands like the Clash and A-ha, was great. So I got both soundtracks from the movie!

What really bugs me is when a movie soundtrack puts songs on the album that weren't in the movie ... they were "inspired by" the movie. Whatever, dude. I got the "Mission: Impossible" soundtrack, only because of the remade theme song by U2 rhythm kings Larry Mullen Jr and Adam Clayton. When I got home, almost all of the songs were "inspired by" the movie, and never even made the movie. The same thing happened with the last couple of "Batman" soundtracks. That makes me think the record labels are solely in it for the money. Granted, that particular album may be a great compilation, but it has nothing to do with the movie in that respect, so why connect the two?

As you can see, I'm pretty opinionated about the whole "soundtrack" issue. Soundtracks on the whole are actually very cool. They bring such a multi-sensory medium like movies to a different level, one where I can think of whatever I want. They feature songs you normally can't hear on the artists' albums or on the radio. They bring out feelings for certain moods that certain movies may or may not have mirrored. And, most importantly, it's another form of collecting great music, which for such a huge music collector like myself, is way ideal.

Movies are cool, but in the end, it's all about the music and the vibe they help create. And that's why we're so compelled to spend loads of money on them. Those damn record companies have us all figured out, don't they?

Near ... far ... wherever you are, Prevatt is still a fourth-year history student.

SOUNDTRACKS

"Braveheart," "Schindler's List" and "Jurassic Park" were also popular. This suggests that people are interested in carrying the emotional experience into their own private lives.

Although emotional appeal is an important aspect of the popularity of soundtracks, there are other, more practical explanations.

"Soundtracks are used to promote movies and records," Chihara says. "Celine Dion is selling a lot of records because of 'Titanic.' Whitney Houston sold a lot of records (with the success of 'The Bodyguard')."

Lovallo has another theory:

"I think they're becoming popular because they are gearing the soundtrack towards today's record buying public," Lovallo says. "Like alternative rock stuff, like in 'The Wedding Singer,' 'Romy and Michele's High School Reunion' and 'Great Expectations' – even though the themes may not be as contemporary, like 'Romeo and Juliet,' the music is very contemporary."

Aaron Wiseman, the CD buyer for Tower Records in Westwood, agrees with Lovallo.

> The most recent trend in soundtracks ... is to produce two kinds of records: one featuring score and the other a compilation of popular music.

"In the past, soundtracks were all score," Wiseman says. "Nowadays, they are like compilation albums."

"It's also an inexpensive way to get certain quality of music," Wisemen continues. "Some soundtracks are all punk, rap, alternative, '80s music – like the 'Wedding Singer' – etc. There are also soundtracks with a variety of music like the soundtrack from 'Casino,' which covers three decades of music."

According to Chihara, this seemingly new trend of packaging popular music in soundtracks was actually set 20 years ago by "Saturday Night Fever."

"Twenty years ago ... the Bee Gees were featured in the soundtrack for 'Saturday Night Fever,'" Chihara says. "That was a huge success. I was told by the producer ... that it made quarter billion dollars. That was a huge amount of money for a soundtrack to make. That set a trend for soundtrack albums to become collections of songs that are used in the movie."

Chihara, who has watched the film music industry grow and change over time, also credits the popularity of score soundtracks to UCLA alumnus John Williams.

"Usually, the soundtrack album consist of songs," Chihara states. "But recently, particularly because of John Williams, the soundtrack is all underscore. There are no songs in the 'Raiders of the Lost Ark' or 'Star Wars.' 'Schindler's List' also did quite well as soundtrack album but there are no songs in the movie except for source music (music that is heard by the characters)."

The most recent trend in soundtracks, according to Wisemen, is to produce two kinds of records: one featuring score and the other a compilation of popular music. This approach of releasing two soundtracks for one movie (used for "Great Expectations" and "The End of Violence") makes the artistic choice for the record company and the producer easier than before.

But whether the soundtrack is all score or a compilation of popular music, a successful soundtrack must appeal to the audience's emotions and tastes.

"It helps to have a successful movie," Chihara says. "'Titanic' was a successful movie and so people want the record. They go hand in hand."

the general audience has already spent several minutes perfecting the ability to answer the gospel performers.

Though the event doesn't offer food from L.A.'s five-star chefs or provide performances from the top-paid musicians of our time, it affords an experience nonetheless enjoyable. Strangers can be seen chatting with each other over the dessert bar and singing side by side on the dance floor. In a day and age when most neighbors have stopped gathering at the local church for Sunday service, it's nice to know that a Sunset club can take up the slack.

Even if most people really can't manage to fork over $26 a week for a chance to eat some eggs and sing some religious songs that they probably don't believe in. Even if the people they feast with aren't their neighbors but individuals they'll probably never see again. Even so, The House of Blues Gospel Sunday Brunch just makes you feel good.

UCLA has no problem handling Anteaters

VOLLEYBALL: Victorious team able to maintain intense play versus UCI

By Grace Wen
Daily Bruin Staff

UC Irvine may be having the best season in its school history, but so is UCLA.

The top-ranked UCLA men's volleyball team continued its winning tear, demolishing the Anteaters 15-5, 15-6, 15-6 in less than an hour and a half. The Bruins are making it a regular practice to send opponents packing before their buses have cooled.

"I thought we played well," UCLA head coach Al Scates said. "I thought we had five players playing well."

Actually, they only needed one.

Setter Brandon Taliaferro came out on fire. The sophomore served six of UCLA's seven aces and posted six kills in seven attempts for a whopping .857 clip. And he also tallied 45 assists.

In game one, the Bruins capitalized on serving and hitting errors by the Anteaters to score the first five points of the match. UCLA didn't need any help the rest of the game as every point after came from a UCLA kill or block. The Bruins could do no wrong as hitter after hitter found the open court.

The Anteaters, however, came alive in game two jumping out to a 5-3 lead. The lead would evaporate as Irvine self-destructed. The Anteaters were blocked twice, aced twice, had a hitting error and were called out of rotation. The string of Irvine errors brought the score to 9-6 and any momentum the Anteaters had was lost.

Game three began slowly for both teams. After 17 sideouts, the score was only 1-1. An Adam Naeve block would start a 9-4 run that ended any hopes Irvine might have had of taking a game off the Bruins.

"I think with a team like that, who's having success for the first time like they are right now, when they play UCLA or top teams, they get a little nervous and they kind of hold back," Taliaferro said.

Irvine head coach Charlie Brande agreed.

"I think at times we played with heart and battled them pretty well," Brande said. "I'm proud of the way we played some of the time.

"Great team that UCLA has. Tremendous focus, they can stay at the same emotional level for a long period of time."

The Bruins will look to continue its winning ways on Saturday night as it hosts No. 12 Lewis University in a non-conference match.

Last year, Lewis almost stole a win as it took UCLA right down to the wire. In a game that took over three hours to play, the Bruins barely edged out the Flyers, 24-22, in the pivotal fifth game.

KEEPING THE FAITH

Spirituality is integral to UCLA athletes, both on and off the court

By Steve Kim
Daily Bruin Staff

Taboo ...

Not every athlete is willing to talk about religion and faith. But these four Bruins, a Muslim and three Christians, are.

Here is a panel of UCLA athletes who are devoted to their religion and willing to give insight into the way they integrate faith with sports and life in general.

While from different backgrounds, they share their unique faiths as student athletes to add to the diversity of lives that constitutes the UCLA student body. Though distinct, they share one thing; they are recognized by their peers and teammates for displaying their religious devotion synonymously with their athletic prowess.

Senior linebacker Brian Willmer is one of the most active Christians on the UCLA football squad. Every day, Willmer prays and studies the Bible. He meets weekly with a Christian organization called Athletes in Action, which promotes greater faith and Bible reading among athletes. He attends non-denominational Grace Community Church in Encino, and regularly speaks to different church youth groups of various denominations.

"It wasn't until my sophomore year until I really understood what it was like to have a relationship with Christ. I grew up in a Christian home and understood it, but I never applied it in my life and I never really learned what it meant to have a continual progression in your relationship."

It was also in his sophomore year as a collegiate football player that he experienced a turning point in his life.

"I just kind of broke down. I was just tired of all the false hopes and expectations that this world holds up – hopes in things that we all hold up as valuable, such as success in athletics, pride, ego, financial success, popularity ..."

Willmer has been able to take this new approach and use it on the football field, starting for the Bruins during their recent successful season. He credits his formidable athletic ability and performance to God.

"The most important thing you do is to give God the glory, because he's allowed us to have this opportunity to live our lives. So when I play football I go out there to give God the glory, thank him. I go out there and play as hard as I can within the rules."

As an athlete on a high-profile sports team, Willmer has had his share of incidents that have challenged his values and beliefs. But he says he's worked through that, and feels that most teammates recognize and respect his beliefs.

"Most of the guys are receptive and open to Christianity because everybody's searching for something. Some guys aren't right now and they don't want to have anything to do with it. But most are respectful of who I am."

Willmer's emphasis on giving glory to God instead of to oneself, while considered unconventional, has given him an alternative purpose of being dedicated in his sport.

"It's hard for people to understand that God would love us so much unconditionally. There's more to life than just money, because we came in this world with nothing and we're going leave this world with nothing. I just hope people can understand that."

Bruins want strong showing this weekend

TRACK: Teams attempt to qualify for NCAAs during upcoming meets

By Alvin Cadman and Donald Morrison
Daily Bruin Contributors

The biggest little city in the world awaits the men's and women's track teams today. Gambling will not be on team's agenda in Reno, NV at the Mountain Pacific Sports Federation (MPSF) Indoor Championships, but for many members, qualifying for the NCAA Championships will be.

"Basically, what we're trying to do is give everyone experience to do well and grow," UCLA head coach Bob Larsen said.

Individual athletes will strive to win their respective events at the MPSF Championships in preparation for the outdoor season.

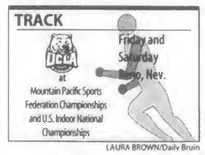
Jim McElroy and Damian Allen will compete in the 55-meter and 200-meter dash. McElroy and Allen are one-hundredth of a second off from an automatic qualifying mark for the 55-meter dash.

Brandon Thomas will also run in the 55-meter dash and freshman Bryan Harrison will make his collegiate debut, running in the 200. Brian Fell, a hurdler, will compete in the 400.

Scott Slover and Wade Tift will go with assistant coach Art Venegas to Atlanta, GA to compete in the U.S. National Indoor Championships. Slover tops the collegiate ranks, along with Jacob Davis of Texas, in the pole vault, with a mark of 18 feet-2 1/2 inches. Tift will compete in the shot put and try to improve his seasonal best mark of 61 1/4.

As the end of the indoor track season looms over the horizon, the UCLA women's track and field team have already begun their preparation for the outdoor season that begins March 7 at Drake Stadium.

They won't be able to look too far ahead, however, because of their competition they must face this weekend at the USA Indoor Championships in Atlanta and the MPSF Indoors.



LAURA BROWN/Daily Bruin

At the USA Championships, held at the Georgia Dome, three of UCLA's best will compete against top-level competition from throughout the country. Senior Rachelle Noble, UCLA's most versatile thrower, is currently ranked 7th in the United States in the hammer throw and 16th in the shot put.

Sophomore Seilala Sua is currently ranked 6th in the shot put, and has already earned an automatic berth to the NCAA Indoor Championships, but will be trying to earn a automatic berth in the hammer throw, alongside UCLA teammate Rachelle Noble.

Freshman Erica Hoernig will also compete this weekend in the women's pole vault at the USA Indoor Championships.

At the MPSF Championships in Reno, the UCLA women will attempt to make a last effort to qualify for the NCAA Indoors. Two important athletes to watch for will be sophomore Deana Simmons and freshman Shakedia Jones.

Simmons, after an outstanding freshman campaign, is ranked 4th in the nation this week in the triple jump.

Jones, a 5-foot-4-inch freshman from Illinois, has made an immediate impact in the sprints. Her provisional qualifying time of 6.84 seconds in the 55 meters is one-hundredth of a second from an automatic berth to the NCAA Indoor Championships.

With Jones and Simmons leading the Bruin women in Reno and with those competing in Atlanta, this weekend should give a clear indication of the type of championship caliber team that the UCLA women will showcase during the upcoming outdoor season.

Seniors hope for invitation to Big Dance

W. BASKETBALL: Bruins to play last home game, anticipate tournament

By David Arnold
Daily Bruin Contributor

What does any one really deserve?

Can anybody say that they deserve to get out of life what they put in?

Do the seniors of UCLA's women's basketball team deserve to be in an NCAA Tournament in appreciation for what they've done for the program?

Seniors Tawana Grimes, Carla Houser, Jamie Oenning and Aisha Veasley won't get the answer they desire until March 8, when teams receive invitations to the Big Dance. The four soon-to-be-alumnae have four more games left, including their final tip-off at Pauley Pavilion this Sunday as UCLA hosts Washington.

Four years ago, Kathy Olivier was a rookie head coach, and Grimes, Oenning and Veasley were her first recruiting class. On Sunday, the coach may sit in a corner office talking about how her seniors "pretty much built this program," and the seniors may remember their first day at UCLA, and realize they have only one more game left on that campus.

And on March 8, maybe the seniors will agree when they remember their coach said, "They have success written all over them."

"The tournament is kinda like our reward, our payback," said Houser. "Since I've been here I've wanted to go to the tournament," said Grimes.

When asked if a Big Dance this year would make up for three years of being wallflowers, Oenning said, "It doesn't make up for it, but it's nice."

"Just the other day," said Olivier, "I grabbed Tawana and I said, 'You know we've got four games left, and we're going to do this. You guys deserve this.'"

Yet they're four seniors with one starter between them (Grimes), so how do they deserve anything?

"They pretty much started the trend of what kind of people we want in our program," said Olivier, "They do a perfect job of representing what UCLA women's basketball is about."

"We don't need to take credit for that," said Grimes. "as much as basketball was a good experience, the people that I've met and the friendships I've established will be the highlights of my having gone here."

"They say that adversity builds character, and I think that's true for our class," said Oenning. "One thing that has really impressed me ... is that we're all so different ... different backgrounds, different lifestyles, different families, different everything."

"That's the biggest thing that I love about these guys ... they do respect that I'm different," said Houser.

Maybe Houser is different from her classmates; she came to UCLA after dropping out of James Madison and being spotted by Olivier at a Friday league game in Long Beach, but that's not to say she doesn't fit in.

"She fit in perfectly the minute she got here, and that says something about Carla Houser," said Olivier.

Oenning is also lucky to have people who acknowledge her contributions. "She provides that leadership: she comes in ready to go every practice," said Olivier. "Her work ethic is something that people look up to."

Though Grimes, Oenning and Veasley will be back for classes in the fall, after this season their history with UCLA athletics will be just that.

"I think we lose a lot of leadership," said Olivier of her seniors' departure. When asked what they think the team loses with their graduation, Houser, Grimes and Oenning perhaps ominously listed "leadership," "discipline," and "maturity." "There's no substitute for maturity," said Oenning, referring to what she calls "a humble, unselfish group."

If four people can have a collective middle name, "unselfish" might apply to the seniors. Grimes, recruited as a shooting guard, has always adapted for the good of the team. This was evident more than ever last year when she was moved to the point after point guard Erica Gomez was injured.

"This year is the first year she's really got to focus on what Tawana Grimes came here for," said Olivier, "Tawana doesn't have to play Miss Everything anymore."

Veasley, too, could be the calendar girl for selflessness. A starter as a junior, sitting on the bench as a senior, Veasley only sought to contribute.

"I think this game really celebrates for us, for years of hard work and contribution," she said.

What hard work will mean for them, they don't know. Olivier hopes she'll see Oenning coaching, Houser playing abroad and alludes to talking with the WNBA and ABL about the plans of Grimes and Veasley.

But Grimes said, "I don't know exactly what I want to do," and the others are mysteries too. Of only Houser may predictions be made: "I've always wanted to play overseas."

"I think they're ready to move on, which is kinda sad," said Olivier, though she added, "They're probably gonna have more money than me."

All joking aside, it will be an emotional Sunday in Pauley. "It's going to be special because this is the first group of girls we've recruited," acknowledged Olivier.

"I don't know whether to cry or laugh. I'm a very emotional person, I know I'm going to be bawling my eyes out," said Houser.

"It's not just another game for me," said Veasley, "This is like the last time I'm going to be playing in front of my family and friends."

If one deserves to get out of life what one puts in, maybe the seniors deserve to end their careers where they dreamed they would: in the NCAA Tournament.

Bruins snare Cougars with last-second shot

M. BASKETBALL: Johnson makes three in repeat of last year's performance

By Emmanuelle Ejercito
Daily Bruin Senior Staff

PULLMAN, Wash. – Kris Johnson had an identity crisis Thursday night at Friel Court. For a moment there, he thought he was Cameron Dollar.

Last year, the No. 18 UCLA men's basketball team needed Dollar's last-second shot to put away Washington State by one point. This year, the Bruins (21-6 overall, 11-4 Pac-10) relied on Johnson's last-second heroics to defeat the Cougars, 78-75.

M. HOOPS: Trip to Seattle puts team to biggest test since McCoy's departure

By Emmanuelle Ejercito
Daily Bruin Senior Staff

PULLMAN, Wash – The No. 18 UCLA men's basketball team will face its biggest and tallest test since the departure of center Jelani McCoy two weeks ago.

The Bruins (21-6 overall, 11-4 Pac-10) will travel to Seattle on Sunday for the second leg of their Washington tour and will tip-off against the University of Washington at Edmundson Pavilion.

When the two teams met last month at Pauley Pavilion, UCLA played a stellar game for 30 minutes and built up a 30-point lead before the Huskies (16-9, 9-7) almost pawed their way back. The Bruins would hang on to win 105-94.

However, McCoy was there to help J.R. Henderson battle against Washington's twin version of the Space Needle – seven-foot starters Todd MacCulloch and Patrick Femerling. McCoy had 16 points and 10 rebounds while MacCulloch spent a lot of time on the pine with early fouls.

MacCulloch, who averages 18.7 and 9.7 rebounds ppg, is crucial to the Huskies' offenses. While on the bench, the Bruins outscored Washington 43-27. But, when MacCulloch was on the floor, the Huskies had a 67-62 advantage.

"We've got to keep (MacCulloch) off the court as much as possible for us to do well," Henderson said. "He's their leading scorer, leading rebounder, so obviously we are going to shut him down if we want to win the game."

Though the Bruins are smaller, they hope to use their quickness as an advantage.

"We're definitely going try and press them to get them to play our style of play," Henderson said. "Hopefully, it will cause a lot of turnovers and get them into foul trouble."

Bruins look to brake four-game skid

BASEBALL: Victory over powerful No. 2 Trojans could turn season around

By Vytas Mazeika
Daily Bruin Staff

The UCLA baseball team has been here before. In fact, they were here two weeks ago.

The Bruins (7-8 overall, 2-3 in the Six-Pac) are in their second four-game losing streak of the season.

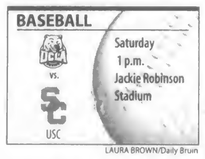
This time, though, UCLA has the daunting task of facing off against No. 2 USC (11-3, 2-1) in a three-game series.

But Bruin head coach Gary Adams noticed a positive change from the team in Wednesday's 11-8 home loss to Cal State Fullerton.

"When you lose four games in a row, you naturally are down," Adams said.

"You can't be up. But I saw signs yesterday, in our game, of us doing some things correctly, which gives me some hope that we can turn this thing around and become a better team."

After a horrendous series against Stanford, Adams called a practice on Monday.



LAURA BROWN/Daily Bruin

Even though there was pouring rain, Adams believed that the team could work on some fundamentals without the ball.

"I told the guys that were there that the practice wasn't a punishment practice," Adams said.

All of the right choices that the Bruin players made in the Fullerton game must be repeated against the Trojans.

USC has been winning games thanks to their pitching.

Their starters for this weekend are senior Seth Etherton (4-0 record, 1.20 ERA), junior Mike Penney (3-1, 1.52) and junior Jason Sacnz (1-1, 2.70).

In contrast, the Bruin starters will be senior John Phillips (0-0, 11.05), freshman Chad Cislak (2-2, 7.13) and

Kings 7, Black Hawks 4

Playing their second game in as many nights following the NHL's break, the surging Kings jumped to an early 4-0 lead against the Chicago Blackhawks on Thursday night and coasted to a 7-4 win..

Los Angeles scored the game's first four goals during a 12:03 span and held a 4-1 lead after one period. The Kings outshot the Blackhawks 13-3 in the first 20 minutes.

Murray opened the scoring with a turn-around shot from the slot during a power play at 3:26. He scored again at 9:08 after a blocked shot bounded onto his stick.

The Blackhawks, who allowed four goals in a period at home for the first time this season, finally broke through on Daze's power-play deflection at 19:32. The goal snapped a Chicago scoreless span against Los Angeles of 154:12.

Perreault's power-play goal at 2:14 of the second period gave the Kings a 5-1 lead. However, Amonte scored at 9:22 and Leroux converted a rebound at 18:36 against Los Angeles goalie Frederic Chabot to make it 5-3 after 40 minutes.

Sharks 3, Blues 1

Jeff Friesen scored his 21st goal as the San Jose Sharks won 3-1 Thursday night over the Blues, who lost goaltender Grant Fuhr in the second period with a knee injury.

Friesen opened the scoring just 67 seconds into the game on a power play. Blues defenseman Marc Bergevin was called for interference only 10 seconds into the game, the first for both teams since NHL referees have been instructed to be tighter in calling penalties.

George Courtnall tied the game less than 4 1/2 minutes later, but the Sharks scored twice in the second period to take control. Ricci scored with 4:48 gone in the period on a rebound, and Matteau scored on a deflection less than a minute later.

The Sharks did not get a shot on goal in the third period, but St. Louis never threatened seriously.

Nets 102, Kings 4

Seconds after the Kings dropped a 102-99 decision to the New Jersey Nets, Jordan chased down Leroy Richardson at mid-court and screamed at the official while pointing a finger repeatedly in his face.

The confrontation came seconds after Mitch Richmond's desperation 3-pointer hit off the backboard, bounced off the front of the rim and fell out, sending the Kings to loss in a game where they held an 18-point first-half lead.

The wild ending featured a questionable foul call against Kings' forward Corliss Williamson after he rebounded a missed foul shot by Otis Thorpe with 24.9 seconds left and Sacramento behind 96-95.

The foul call so enraged Jordan that he walked on the court and screamed at Richardson, drawing a technical foul.

Jayson Williams had 20 points and 16 rebounds before fouling out in the final minutes. Van Horn added 16 and Kittles 15.

The Kings opened a 48-30 lead with 7:01 left in the second quarter. A 15-3 run late in the half got New Jersey to within 57-52 and made it a game. The contest was the fourth in five nights for Sacramento. Kendall Gill returned to the Nets starting lineup after missing Tuesday's game with a sore big toe. The Kings hit 23 of their first 32 shots (72 percent) and finished the game at 51 percent. Kittles had a season-high four steals.

M. BASKETBALL

Washington State tied the score at 75 behind Carlos Daniel's two free throws. So with 27 seconds left in the game, UCLA had one last chance to prevent an overtime game.

Baron Davis brought the ball up the court and passed it to Johnson. Davis wanted the ball back, but Johnson kept dribbling against WSU's Will Hutchens. Johnson waved his teammates off, and with 0.3 seconds to go, sank his only three-pointer of the night. Johnson ranks sixth in the conference with his 42.2 three-point percentage.

"I made up my mind to take that shot," Johnson said. "My dad had told me this story about Sidney Wicks (a former UCLA star) how he had the ball and he waved a couple of guys off and hit a 25-footer. When I went and got the ball at the top that thought flashed in my mind, and I was like, 'Forget this, I'm taking it.'

"I work on my threes everyday after practice, so I was real comfortable and real confident in taking that shot. I really felt that it was going to go in."

In a game that would finish last in a beauty contest, UCLA struggled all night against Washington State (9-18, 2-14). The Bruins shot only 38.7 percent from the field in the first half, though the Cougars shot worse at 35.7 percent. But WSU would still take a 36-32 lead into intermission.

The second half was punctuated with multiple ties and lead changes. But all three seniors would make pivotal plays to pull out their 100th career victory.

Toby Bailey drove down the baseline for a slam and a foul to put the Bruins up by two with 2:29 left. Meanwhile J.R. Henderson did his job on the defensive end blocking a Cougar attempt with 0:52 remaining to keep a 75-73 lead intact a few precious seconds longer.

And of course there was Johnson's game-winning shot. Johnson led the team with 20 points, followed by Bailey with 19 and Henderson with 15. Both Bailey and Henderson were the leading rebounders for the Bruins with nine each.

"I thought our seniors down the stretch really stepped up," said UCLA head coach Steve Lavin. "It was kind of appropriate that our seniors' 100th victory that they were the ones that determined the outcome down the stretch."

There was a scary moment for the Bruins in the second half, however. Freshman Earl Watson suffered a concussion and was knocked unconscious when Watson went up to try to contest Daniel's shot at the 15:56 mark.

On their way down, Daniel's forearm belted the right side of Watson's face. Watson laid face down on the floor for seven minutes and it wasn't until 10 minutes had passed that Watson walked off the floor under his own power.

a third starter to be named later.

On top of being worried about the pitching, Adams is well aware that USC is great every year.

During Adams' tenure, the Bruins are 55-83 against the Trojans and overall USC holds a 216-94 advantage over UCLA.

"They've got a well-balanced team," Adams explained. "I don't think there is any one thing.

"That's the reason why they're doing so well. They've been playing good defense, they've been hitting well, and they're pitching has been pretty phenomenal so far."

Last year, the Bruins split the six games with the Trojans – winning two at home and one on the road.

On Friday and Sunday, the Bruins will travel to USC's Dedeaux Field. On Saturday, the Trojans will visit UCLA's Jackie Robinson Stadium for a 1 p.m. game.

RELIGION

UCLA women's soccer player Sommer Hammoud has had the best freshman season anyone could ever want, topping it all off with the honor of being named Pac-10 Freshman of the Year. Such success only comes through dedication and hard work, and she gives all of that to her sport while maintaining her devotion to the religion of Islam.

As a Muslim, Hammoud follows the five pillars of Islam. The first says there is no god but Allah (Arabic for God), and the prophet Muhammad is his messenger. The remaining pillars require prayer five times a day, fasting during the month of Ramadan, giving charity and making a pilgrimage to Mecca, the Islamic center of holiness.

For Hammoud, praying five times a day hasn't really conflicted with her busy class and soccer schedule, because a prayer only takes five to 10 minutes. As for fasting during the month of Ramadan, she makes no compromises about practicing her faith despite a difficult athletic regiment that requires a lot of energy.

"This past month of Ramadan, daylight was from five in the morning 'til five at night. It was a 12-hour period of fasting, so it was a good month. Sometimes, it ends like at eight at night. It becomes difficult when you put sports into it, but I've played entire games fasting. It's hard but you keep going.

"It helps when you have friends who are also Muslims who fast with you. Fortunately, there's a large Muslim community here. They're supportive and excited that someone (who is a) Muslim excels in sports. It's a good thing."

"Before I started college, my family and I used to go to the mosque every Sunday. That became hard to do because I was involved in soccer and games were on Sundays. It's not much of a mandatory thing to go every Sunday, but it's good to go because it keeps you focused on your religion."

Even as the sole Muslim on the soccer squad, and a member of a religion that is not prominent in the U.S., Hammoud says she hasn't come across anyone opposed to her faith of Islam.

"People are pretty understanding. They're usually interested and want to know more. And I like talking about it and telling what it's all about because I'm proud of it.

"You think of the perfect moral person and that's why my religion is trying to teach you to be. Being moral is something I encounter not only in sports but in everyday life. And if you're strong inside, you keep away from the things you might get in trouble with.

"Thank God my parents brought me up around Muslim kids my age feeling it was okay. I know kids who didn't grow up with other Muslim kids and they find it hard. There's peer pressure and some people have slipped."

But Hammoud hasn't. She has proven to be dedicated to her sport, academics and religion. For Hammoud, faith is something she can't do without.

"It's a way of life. It has a lot to do with peace – peace within yourself, peace in groups. It teaches you how to behave, how to act towards others. It basically encompasses every aspect of your daily life."

I've been a Christian ever since I was born, but I really didn't like it," said Billy Knight. "Basically, my mom forced me to go to church."

A member of the highly touted freshman class of the UCLA basketball team, Knight admits he was once religious just because he was born into it. It wasn't until his sophomore year in high school he felt an importance in his Christian faith.

"After my grandmother died, I started reading her Bible. She wrote a bunch of notes in it about where to look if you get into trouble, feeling bad and things like that. So I got more interested in the Bible, Christianity and following God."

Knight reads the Bible every day and attends church on Sundays when he's not traveling with the team, which prays as a group before each game.

Knight considers himself seriously dedicated to Christianity, and tries to spread his faith to his teammates.

> "If you follow God, good things will happen, so keep your hopes up."
> Billy Knight
> Freshman basketball player

"You know, a lot of basketball players aren't Christians. They don't know much about God, so I try to tell them about Him. And if they want to follow Him, they can; and if they don't, that's their option. I try to take away the stereotype about basketball players not being religious; even athletes as a whole."

Knight admits that in a popular sport like basketball, one faces a lot of challenges. He also admits it's easy for one to get caught up in all the fun and excitement.

"Especially (when you're) on the basketball team, a lot of girls come up to you. And then a lot of people come up and say this or that about your teammates, saying they're selfish or no good. You just have to watch out and try to stay pure and not get down on yourself, because right now I'm not playing that much. But I just keep my faith and let God work it out for me."

Even through the peer pressure and taunting from others, Knight stands his ground.

"A lot of people make fun of you and put you down and say stuff like, 'What's up? Don't you like messing with girls?' But if I try to follow all the materialistic things, they're just here now and gone later."

Going against the grain is always a challenge. Knight's faith has been strong enough to keep him dignified. Like many other Christian athletes, he emphasizes giving glory to God.

"I really like what Evander Holyfield did, coming out to gospel music and Bible verses. I want to give God the glory in everything I do in my life."

After his basketball career is over, Knight wants to become a minister or pastor.

"I was thinking about life. I'm not like a really high-profile basketball player, but I'm at UCLA. So I found a calling in my life to preach and tell everyone about God.

"I want to have a homeless shelter and help out orphans or kids less fortunate. I just want to show them that if you follow God, good things will happen, so keep your hopes up."

One word to describe senior swimmer Lindsay Etter is "consistent." She has consistently been a fast swimmer. She has consistently been friendly and considerate of others. And, she has consistently been religious.

Etter was brought up in a Christian household. A three-time All-American athlete and the UCLA record-holder in the 100- and 200-yard breastroke, Etter prefers to focus on other things when she's in the pool.

"God's given me a reason to swim. A lot of people swim for medals or recognition. Those are all things that go away. They lose their value. Years from now, I'm not going to remember what place I got or what times I swam.

"I'm thankful to God for giving me this talent for swimming and bring me so far – to UCLA, a lot of great friends and memories. A lot of times, I swim what I call 'thank you' performances. Usually, I just swim and use the talent he gave me and every race turns out to be great that way. It's always a hundred percent because if you're doing it for him, it's more meaningful than just a gold medal."

Years of involvement in Athletes in Action, Bible study and church service have put life into a different perspective for Etter. But as a freshman coming from a religious family in Texas, she had to find her own way of practicing her faith in college.

"When I first got to school, it was different because all of a sudden I had to find my own church rather than going to church with my parents. So I tried different churches and found out what pastor and college groups I liked."

Etter now attends Grace Community Church with her boyfriend, Brian Willmer, and shares fellowship with him and her other friends. Since the swimming team consists of numerous other Christians, Etter rarely comes across situations that conflict with her religious values.

Etter's life isn't one of huge sacrifice or revelations. She's not what one would call a born-again Christian. Even though her life isn't filled with religious conflicts or difficulties that needed to be overcome, her faith still grows strongly – consistently.

"For a long time, I used to think of being Christian as like a personality trait. You realize as you go through college that things come and go. But for me, Christ is always there and will be there. That's what God means to me–a friend forever. Knowing that brings me through all situations."

MED CENTER: Fund-raising effort already halfway to goal of raising total of $1.2 billion

By Kathryn Combs
Daily Bruin Staff

Campaign UCLA, a campus-wide fundraising effort slated to span seven years, is working better than expected, officials say.

Lucky for anyone involved in the medical sciences at UCLA, half of the $1.2 billion total is going to support their prospects and programs.

But where exactly is the money going?

A little more than half of the $600 million will go toward the Center for the Health Sciences (CHS) reconstruction program, said Roger Meyer, director of development for the Health Sciences Development Group.

Of that $600 million, the $330 million going into capital programs will support four main construction efforts.

Current plans include a new hospital, two additional research facilities and the completion of the Gonda (Goldschmeid) Neuroscience and Genetics Research Center.

The overall CHS reconstruction project is estimated to cost $1.1 billion; only $330 million of which is funded by Campaign UCLA.

And while only part of Campaign UCLA construction funds will go toward the reconstruction project, the difference will be funded by other state and federal sources, said Sarah Jensen, assistant vice chancellor for Capital Programs with the Health Sciences.

"Capital campaign funds are going into the two new, seismic-replacement buildings," Jensen said, explaining that the current research facilities were damaged beyond repair in the earthquake and will be replaced by two new facilities.

Plans also include the seismic renovation of an already existing educational facility, part of which will include the Bio-Medical Library.

Monies may also be directed to needed areas at the Santa Monica-UCLA Medical Center, Meyer said.

Now, three years into the campaign, more than $314 million of the $600 million

Alumnus elected state assembly speaker

POLITICS: Villaraigosa exceptional as leader, powerful speechmaker

By Gregory Mena
Daily Bruin Senior Staff

It was the first image that came to his mind: Antonio Villaraigosa speaking at a rally on the steps of Murphy Hall. It was the late '70s, and students were protesting anti-immigrant legislation proposed in the California Assembly.

When he addressed the crowd, Antonio had an intuitive knack for phrasing things in just the right way, remembered Juan Gomez-Quiñones, UCLA history professor.

Legislators may not have heard of Villaraigosa then, but now, 20 years later, he is running the Assembly.

On Thursday, Villaraigosa, D-Los Angeles, was sworn in as the next speaker of the California Assembly, replacing Cruz Bustamante, D-Fresno. He will serve a maximum of three years.

"It's an honor, there's no question about it, to be elected by my colleagues," Villaraigosa said.

"What it says is that the American dream is still alive."

Villaraigosa rose to his new position "the hard way." He is very proud of his story and presents himself as a living example of opportunity fulfilled.

Villaraigosa was born and raised in East Los Angeles. He encountered a major setback at the age of five, when his father walked out of his life, leaving his mother to raise three children.

Finishing high school was problematic, to say the least. He earned a reputation as a fighter and was expelled from Cathedral High School for brawling and for a poor academic record. He dropped out of another school, Roosevelt High, for a while but returned to graduate in 1971.

The Associated Press

UCLA alumnus Antonio Villaraigosa delivers his swearing-in speech at the State Assembly on Thursday. The new speaker of the Assembly said that he reached success "the hard way."

He then attended East L.A. Community College and sharpened his GPA.

At that time, Villaraigosa recalled making good money working as a machine operator. He was sure to be promoted, too, and to earn even more.

That was when his letter of acceptance from UCLA arrived, presenting him with a dilemma.

But we know how that turned out.

"I had a wonderful education at UCLA. It was during those years that I formed a big part of who I am," Villaraigosa said.

He entered the university, admittedly, as an "affirmative action baby," and remains grateful for that chance.

"Somebody opened the door of opportunity for me, and I want to keep it open for other people," Villaraigosa said.

As an undergraduate, Villaraigosa studied history and was remembered as a "hard worker" in the classroom.

"He had family responsibilities, and he was also active in the community," Gomez-Quiñones said. "That requires a lot of stamina and commitment."

While at UCLA, he was an organizer for Movimiento Estudiantil Chicano de Aztlan (MEChA).

DIVERSITY: Dropout rates among underrepresented students stump educators

By George Sweeney

With the advent of Proposition 209 and similar legislation throughout the country, race and ethnicity can no longer be used as criteria for admissions policy at a growing number of American universities.

As a result, some educators feel new ways need to be found to level the collegiate playing field.

Educators from public universities and community colleges all over the country met at Covel Commons on Thursday and Friday to discuss ways to allow disadvantaged students opportunities to learn in a university setting.

Attendees focused on ways to halt or slow dropout rates amongst incom-

Clinton's lowered loan rate plan well received

An offer made Wednesday by President Clinton to reduce interest rates on college student loans is good news to state officials and students.

The reduction Clinton is touting will cut the interest rate on student loans from 7.8 to 7 percent, potentially saving each public university or college student who takes out a loan $650 a year.

"I am pleased to announce that we are proposing improvements in the student loan program that will lower the cost of college for millions of students and their families while preserving their access to the loans they need," Vice President Al Gore announced at a press conference Wednesday.

Although the reductions had been scheduled to go into effect on July 1, many lenders worried about the losses in profits that would result from an interest rate reduction, said Thomas Butts, associate vice president for government relations.

"The problem is the bankers and lenders in the guaranteed (loan) programs don't like losing money," Butts said. "They want our students to pay more to subsidize their profits through the loan industry."

Law schools fight ban on affirmative action

Law schools across the county are lashing back at recent attempts to banish affirmative action from law school admissions.

The effects of setbacks in affirmative action at California and Texas law schools have led to the naming of February as National Minority Law Recruitment Month.

The month is part of a commitment to diversity and minority recruitment by the Law School Admission Council, said Leo Romero, Law School Admission Council chairman.

The Law School Admission Council is the national organization that produces the LSAT, administers the LSAT internationally and deals with law school applicants.

This renewed commitment started after the council noticed results of Proposition 209, which amended California's constitution, and the Hopwood Case in Texas.

Medication errors are killing, study finds

In the past years, deaths caused from medication errors became the second leading cause of death in the United States. The study, conducted by mortality expert David Phillips and his colleagues at UC San Diego, reviewed morality rates from 1983-1993.

According to the study medication errors increased at a higher rate that any other cause of death except AIDS.

"Although medication-error morality rates increased over this period for both inpatients and outpatients," Phillips said, "the increase was especially marked in outpatients."

During the 10-year study period, the number of outpatient visits for medical care increased by 75 percent, while the number of inpatient days decreased by 21 percent. The increase in outpatient visits implies that patients can take more medications without supervision, allowing more room for errors.

According to the study, African American males experienced the highest increase in medication-error deaths, followed by white male, African American females and white females.

In terms of pharmacology, analgesics and anesthetics showed the highest increase in deaths.

"Our data suggests that the medical personnel may need to compensate for changes in medical care by increased vigilance in the delivery and monitoring of medications, especially for outpatients," said Phillips. "There is a growing concern about the quality and continuity of physician-patient relationships. In the case of the medication errors, this concern may be justified."

Climbing the walls

With an expression of intensity, third-year psycho-bio student Christina Copland climbs the rock wall at the Wooden Center.

Whether you're safe and sound on UCLA's rock wall or spending the night on a ledge 1,900 feet above the ground, rock climbing offers a new thrill to those who have overcome Step-Reebok's challenge

Mark Brown prepares to grab the next rock on the wall.

At 1,500 feet in the air, the [illegible] of his body resting on his fingertips and his toes, Jason Ballas was not worried about what he was going to have for dinner that evening or how much money was in his checking account. Ballas' only concern was to reach the next hold so he could curl up on a rock ledge and call it a day.

Ballas is engaged in one of the newest trends to hit the fitness scene: rock climbing. Though rock climbing first became popular in the '70s as Californians Royal Robbins and Yvon Chouinard (founder of Patagonia) led the sport, today rock climbing is bigger than ever, with men and women of all ages reaching new heights in record time and rock-climbing gyms popping up in cities around the world.

Ballas, director of UCLA Outdoor Adventures, a division of UCLA Recreation, says the program's goal is to "provide the UCLA community with an avenue to the wonders of the outdoors." Ballas is responsible for the latest addition to the John Wooden center, home of UCLA's recreation department.

Not a "big piece of abstract art", as first time climber John Stevenson thought when he entered the building, the monstrosity next to the racquetball court is a rock climbing wall available to students and faculty whose inner child longs for the playground jungle gym.

Anyone interested in learning the basics of rock [illegible]mbing can show up at the wall during hours of [illegible]peration for a 20-minute orientation, conducted by an Outdoor Adventures instructor on staff. Aron Bookman, one of the supervisors, recommends that anyone interested in learning to climb take advantage of orientations before the end of winter quarter. Next quarter they will be replaced by additional two-hour seminars at a cost of $15.

Orientation includes an introduction to climbing equipment, rope tying, belaying (managing the rope for the climber), communication skills and basic climbing techniques. For a more detailed introduction to rock climbing, the two-hour seminars -Rock I and Rock II are offered several times per quarter.

For nature lovers, Rock I is the perfect place to begin. At 8 a.m. on a Saturday morning, 20 students led by five instructors gather at Stoney Point in Chatsworth for a rendezvous with Mother Nature. Beginning with a game of trust and some warm up stretches, students then strap on their shoes and helmets to practice edging and smearing on large boulders.

Once comfortable with edging (using the edge of the shoe to stand on a narrow hold) and smearing (using a large surface area of your shoe to grasp the rock), Rock I students divide into two large groups and head for different sites of the park. At the sites, climbers are divided into trios consisting of one climber, one belayer and one back-up belayer.

Inner-city, middle-school students get taste of college life

OUTREACH: Project gives Mortar Board mentors chance to guide children

By Pauline Vu
Daily Bruin Contributor

Last Saturday, a group of junior-high students marveled at some of the wonders of Ackerman Union: the arcade, the candy store and, of course, the birds that live in the Treehouse.

"Hey, I just saw a bird in here!"

"Man, you're trippin.'"

"Wait, I saw it too! It flew by."

"I told you."

UCLA's Mortar Board, a national honor society, was holding "L.A. Teen Mentoring," the main service project for which they had been preparing all year. About 60 students from Charles Drew Middle School in Watts arrived by bus at 9 a.m. to meet and spend the day with UCLA students.

Last year was the first year Mortar Board participated in L.A. Teen Mentoring, said Community Service Chair Khanh Nguyen, a fourth-year biology student. "We hope it's a trend."

Due to the nature of the Mortar Board, members change every year, and so a continuation of the program is uncertain. Khanh hopes to influence the next Community Service Chair to make this an annual event.

The day began with introductions and a breakfast of donuts and orange juice. Afterwards, the students were split into groups of 10 and taken on a tour of the campus, during which they followed the footsteps of hundreds of past tourists and had to guess, according to tour guide Joseph Abrajano, "the one lie we're going to tell during the tour."

The tour was an eye-opener for the adolescents to the various activities and opportunities of campus life. They suspiciously eyed the campus squirrel population, observed a women's basketball practice session in Pauley Pavilion, climbed atop the Bruin Bear and watched, enthralled, as a troupe of theater students vibrantly performed Shakespeare's "Much Ado About Nothing" in the middle of the Sculpture Garden.

"Hey, that guy kissed that other guy!" one student noticed.

Students also wandered briefly onto Spaulding Field, and some boys got a taste of UCLA football when they rammed, full force, into a hanging, heavy punching bag for the tackle.

"Arrrrgh! My arm!" one boy shouted feelingly, clutching a wounded limb.

The Mortar Board has had a history of helping out Drew Middle School, in particular, with its community service programs. During the school year, members work as volunteers to the after-school program, "Teamworks," a 15-week leadership program for Drew students.

Drew students can get into Teamworks by filling out an application when someone – a teacher or even themself – nominates them.

"Normally somebody sees something in them, some leadership ability. It can be good or bad – we have some gang members in the program, too. But they all have charisma. We're hoping for a kind of ripple effect," said Michael Breen, School Coordinator for Teamworks and a science teacher at Drew.

The program, which centers around team-building and leadership activities, has been very successful at Drew. Each

Students sought for service

ACTIVISM: With school, work, many don't have time to help community

By Starr Keilman

Community service is a delicate matter, between coordinating groups, being sensitive to diverse cultures and racial groups, and getting students to participate when they are facing multiple demands on their time.

To address these issues, the second UCLA Community Service Conference taught organizers and interested students how to solve some of these problems.

Joann Digneo, director of the Literacy Program at Occidental College, speaks at a workshop on "Creative Tutorial Methods."

Community service embraces many different areas, as Saturday's conference showed. At UCLA, students have a wide variety of options for service. The Community Service Commission (CSC) alone is the home of 22 different organizations, including the Bruin Partners, which tutors at elementary schools, the Prison Coalition, and Women and Youth Supporting Each Other, which tutors middle and high school girls.

The conference, presented by a collaboration of eight UCLA groups, sought to acknowledge this diversity with a wide range of topics and speakers.

Sen. Tom Hayden opened the conference with a keynote address on the importance of community service at the university level. Sporting a prayer shawl from the Dalai Lama, Hayden said that universities have an obligation as public institutions to move community service from a marginal stance back into the mainstream.

Hayden offered that community service is a part of being a human being, asking, "If you're not engaged in service, what are you engaged in?"

Hayden presented a workshop on Community Service Legislation, a current project of the senator. Since students often are forced to choose among classes, work and community service, service often gets left behind. Hayden's legislation aims to make community service a more feasible option, by lowering the tuition of those involved in service work.

Another workshop focused on the nuances of race and culture in doing service work.

Many service providers do not realize that they are coming from one perspective, and sometimes fail to respect other cultures, said

Republicans claim audits target Southerners, low-income groups

IRS: Congress concerned with abuse of authority, earned income program

By David Pace
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON – If you're poor and live in the South, you might want to check that federal income tax return very carefully before sending it off to the Internal Revenue Service.

A study by the General Accounting Office found that 47 percent of randomly audited taxpayers over the past three years live in 11 Southern states. Overall, in the South and nationwide, more than 85 percent of those audited randomly had incomes below $25,000.

The number of taxpayers selected at random for audits is small, compared with the total number of IRS audits. During the 1994-1996 tax years, for example, the GAO said only 2,961 of the 5.6 million returns audited were selected at random.

Random audits are restricted to groups the IRS has suspicions about, one of which comprises low-income working families who claim the earned income tax credit. To qualify for that credit, a couple with one child must earn less than $25,760, with virtually no interest or other unearned income.

"The emphasis on attacking the poor is unconscionable," said Sen. Paul Coverdell, R-Ga., who requested the GAO study. "You can't help but conclude that they've decided if they go after somebody who's defenseless – it's easier."

But House Speaker Newt Gingrich, R-Ga., and other prominent Republicans repeatedly have attacked the earned income tax program as a prime example of fraud and abuse in government.

Last April, the Treasury Department reported that 26 percent of claims for the benefit – $4.4 billion worth – went to unqualified recipients. Gingrich has even suggested abolishing inheritance taxes, the lost revenue recouped by tightening the earned income tax program.

Agency officials contend the 2,961 random audits weren't truly random.

John M. Dalrymple, the IRS acting chief compliance officer, said the agency targeted six groups for random audits from 1994 through 1996 because of "suspected or known noncompliance" with tax laws. The largest comprised taxpayers claiming the earned income tax credit, who the GAO said were singled out because of the repeated congressional criticisms that taxpayers were abusing the credit.

Other targeted groups were Ohio restaurants with alcoholic-beverage licenses, returns where more than one taxpayer claimed the same dependent, self-employed Georgians claiming business losses and collecting the earned income tax credit as well, self-employed Missourians who didn't pay a self-employment tax, and sole proprietors in Illinois with questionable wholesale and retail filings.

GAO said the IRS selected 7,421 returns at random from those six groups during the three years, plus an undisclosed number picked from the earned income tax credit group in 1996. The IRS gave the congressional watchdog agency detailed information about only the 2,961 audits that were completed, of which 1,380, or 47 percent, were from the 11 Southern states. Only 29 percent of Americans live there.

Taxpayers claiming the earned income credit accounted for more than 80 percent of random audits completed during the three years. Since the credit is designed to help the working poor, and since the South is the nation's poorest region, a higher concentration of random audits would have been expected in the South.

But Coverdell, who provided a copy of the unreleased report to The Associated Press, said the IRS shouldn't audit anyone unless it has reason to suspect a violation of tax law.

"For them to just knock on your door one morning out of the blue and say we're just going to rummage around here – that just runs against the American grain," he said.

No law prohibits random audits, but considerable opposition to the practice has arisen in Congress.

Social Democrats look to oust Helmut Kohl

GERMANY: Governor to seek chancellor position in September elections

By Tony Czuzka
The Associated Press

HANOVER, Germany – In a state vote with nationwide consequences, Lower Saxony Gov. Gerhard Schroeder won a sweeping re-election Sunday – and, in the process, a shot at ousting Chancellor Helmut Kohl after 16 years in power.

Confident in the governor's popularity, the Social Democratic Party said it will nominate the telegenic Schroeder on Monday as its candidate in September's race against the conservative Kohl, Europe's longest-serving leader.

"The Kohl era is over," Schroeder declared after partial returns gave his party more than 48 percent of the vote, compared to about 36 percent for Kohl's Christian Democratic Union.

The 53-year-old Schroeder, who said he would accept the nomination, said Sunday's election "signals a deep-seated wish for change in politics."

Already campaigning, the governor said he would fight to end unemployment, a key election issue in a country where joblessness is at a postwar high of more than 12 percent.

A fan of President Clinton and British leader Tony Blair, Schroeder presents a moderate-left challenge to years of conservative rule – much as with Clinton in 1992 and Blair last year. He wants to reach out to middle-class voters to avenge four straight Social Democratic defeats by Kohl.

For Europe, a victory by Schroeder in the chancellor's race would extend the continent's shift to the left, following Blair's Labor Party win and the election of socialist Prime Minister Lionel Jospin.

Christian Democrats were quick to dismiss the election's importance. "A huge victory in one state has no meaning in the federal elections," Peter Hintze, the party leader, said in Bonn.

Still, many Lower Saxons saw larger consequences in Sunday's vote, casting their ballot for Schroeder to send him into the chancellor's race even though that would take him away from the state.

"I voted for the SPD so he'll become a chancellor candidate," said student Jakob Krovoza, 22. "He stands for economic competence."

The Lower Saxony governor's recipe of saving jobs with state aid while promoting flexible working hours and deregulation has served him well. His northern state relies on jobs in heavy industry and at Volkswagen, Europe's biggest automaker.

But Schroeder's biggest appeal may be that he presents a new face to Germans ready for a change.

"We need some movement in German politics," said Rosemarie Bewersdorff, 68, after casting her vote in Hanover. "It's always that way when parties have been in power too long."

Polls indicate Schroeder has a far stronger chance to beat Kohl on Sept. 27 than the Social Democratic Internal report says U.S. should act 'irrational and vindictive'

MILITARY: Threat of nuclear retaliation would scare potential attackers

By John Diamond
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON – The United States should maintain the threat of nuclear retaliation with an "irrational and vindictive" streak to intimidate would-be attackers such as Iraq, according to an internal military study made public Sunday.

The study, "Essentials of Post-Cold War Deterrence," was written by the Air Force's Strategic Command, military headquarters responsible for the nation's strategic nuclear arsenal. It was obtained under the Freedom of Information Act by an arms control group and published Sunday in a report on U.S. strategies for deterring attacks by antagonistic nations using chemical, biological or nuclear weapons.

"Because of the value that comes from the ambiguity of what the U.S. may do to an adversary if the acts we seek to deter are carried out, it hurts to portray ourselves as too fully rational and cool-headed," the 1995 Strategic Command study says.

The London-based think tank, the British-American Security Information Council, cited the STRATCOM document as an example of the Pentagon's push to maintain a mission for its nuclear arsenal long after the Soviet threat disappeared.

The report portrays the command as fighting and winning an internal bureaucratic battle against liberal Clinton administration officials who lean in favor of dramatic nuclear weapons reductions. Citing a range of formerly classified documents obtained through the Freedom of Information Act, the report shows how the United States shifted its nuclear deterrent strategy from the defunct Soviet Union to so-called rogue states: Iraq, Libya, Cuba, North Korea and the like.

In its study, the Strategic Command uses Cold War language in Indonesian president faces pressing economic crisis

STRATEGY: Suharto backs $43-billion bailout plan to stabilize soaring food prices, unemployment rates

By Geoff Spencer
The Associated Press

JAKARTA, Indonesia – Coasting to another five-year term but under pressure to halt soaring food prices, President Suharto called for changes Sunday to an International Monetary Fund plan to help save his limping economy.

Suharto told the 1,000-member People's Consultative Assembly, which is expected to re-elect him unopposed later this week, that he remained committed to carrying out the IMF's $43-billion rescue package.

However, Suharto said additional strategies were needed as life gets tougher in the world's fourth-most populous country. The bailout was approved last year and revised in January after the crisis worsened.

"Despite the fact that we already have started to carry out clear and fundamental reforms and a restructuring program, there are no signs yet that the situation has improved," the 76-year-old leader said in the nationally televised speech.

"On the contrary, the people's life is becoming more difficult," said the president, whose 32 years in power make him Asia's longest-serving leader.

Suharto did not specify what reform changes he wanted but said new measures could be introduced as an "IMF-Plus" formula.

There's been some worry in financial markets that Indonesia has been too slow to follow through with IMF

Eight killed in Algeria after presidential talk

ALGIERS, Algeria – Eight people were killed outside an Algerian town where, only hours before, the president vowed to end the country's insurgency, security forces said Sunday.

In a rare government admission of violence, security forces said in a statement that the victims were "killed in a cowardly way" in Ouled Salem, near the town of Medea, where President Liamine Zeroual spoke Saturday.

"Killed in a cowardly way" is usually how the government describes killings in which the victims' throats are slit. The statement gave no other details.

In his first trip as president to Medea – one of the regions most afflicted by the 6-year-old insurgency – Zeroual said, "The destruction and loss of human life cannot undermine our determination to eradicate this blight that is foreign to our society and our religion."

Thousands have been killed in the Medea area, about 60 miles south of Algiers, by attackers wielding knives, swords, axes and guns. No Algerian president has visited Medea since the insurgency began.

An estimated 75,000 people have been killed since the insurgency began in 1992 after the army canceled legislative elections that Islamic fundamentalist parties were poised to win.

Floods in Afghanistan kill 30, injure 300

PESHAWAR, Pakistan – Flash floods that roared through southern Afghanistan killed at least 30 people and injured 300, Afghan officials and aid workers said Sunday.

Relentless rains over the past week caused severe flooding in several poor farming villages in the provinces of Kandahar, Helmand, Zabul and Nimroz, officials said.

"Three districts in Kandahar were completely inundated this week, killing 20 people and destroying dozens of homes," said Ahmed, a spokesman for the Taliban Islamic army in Kandahar. Like many Afghans, Ahmed uses only one name.

He said at least 10 more people died in neighboring provinces when floods washed away roads.

United Nations officials in neighboring Pakistan say they have received reports that about 300 people have been hospitalized with injuries suffered in the flash floods.

Crew member killed in movie-set accident

A film crew member who was burned when a camera boom hit a 150,000-volt power line remained hospitalized on Sunday, a day after services were held for his electrocuted colleague.

David Riggio, 33, was in fair condition Sunday at the Grossman Burn Center at Sherman Oaks Hospital, spokeswoman Ann Shreck said. On Saturday, he underwent surgery to replace dead tissue with cadaver skin to prevent infection.

Doctors have said they expect him to recover, although he still could lose a toe because of his injuries.

Riggio suffered second and third-degree burns to his feet, hands and chest when sandbags used as a counterweight fell off a camera boom, causing it to ride 49 feet into the air and hit overhead power lines during filming of the Walt Disney Co. animated film "Dinosaur."

Matthew Gordy, 31, was killed during Wednesday's accident in a remote area of San Bernardino County, about 150 miles northeast of Los Angeles.

SANTA ANA, Calif. – A state tool to help solve rapes and murders through DNA matchups is being compromised because authorities are failing to supply blood samples from thousands of violent criminals, a critic charged.

The samples, required by state law, have been taken from only 100,000 of about 300,000 eligible criminals, according to Rock Harmon, an Alameda County prosecutor and expert in the use of DNA evidence in court.

"The potential is totally compromised," Harmon said. "Samples that should be going in there simply aren't going in."

California law requires blood samples from those convicted of rape, assault, murder or other sexual or violent crimes.

The results are processed, the DNA identified and the result

Bars owners try to sidestep anti-smoking law

REGULATION: Businesses cover for smokers in attempt to keep patrons

By Kathleen Sullivan
San Francisco Examiner

SAN FRANCISCO – One barkeeper puts out shot glasses as ashtrays. Another erects a sign: "Check us out. There's lots to do. Games and tunes and smoking too. Legally." A third posts its "No Smoking" signs in Chinese, Spanish and Vietnamese.

Owners of pubs and taverns are finding a variety of ways to cope with the problems that recalcitrant smokers pose in complying with the state's newest anti-smoking law.

At Rover's Inn, an Irish pub in San Francisco, the ashtrays have disappeared, but another piece of glassware has taken its place: a shot glass, half filled with water.

"We tell customers it's against the law to smoke," said Vince Hogan, an Irish immigrant who owns Rover's Inn. "But it's my property, and if someone chooses to break the law, I don't want them putting the cigarette butts and ashes on my bar or the floor of my bar."

The statewide law doesn't ban ashtrays. But officials recommend removing them to rid bars of "cues" that say smoking is all right.

Hogan put up awnings so smokers can take shelter from El Niño storms while they smoke outside. Still, some persist in lighting up inside. And Hogan understands.

"You can't expect them to stand out there in that rain when there's a cozy bar inside," he said.

So far, neither Hogan nor his patrons have been cited for violating the law.

California's smoke-free workplace law banned smoking in enclosed workplaces in 1995. Bars, taverns and cardrooms – which employ 850,000 people in the state – were exempted until 1998.

The law is designed to protect employees from secondhand smoke and affects more than 38,000 businesses, including 31,700 restaurant bars and 6,700 "stand-alone" bars.

pride to electing a Latino speaker. I represent Latinos, but I represent all of California," he said.

His political agenda focuses on education, health care and children issues reflective of his own life.

He wrote a bill in 1995 providing $33 million to keep juvenile probation camps going. Last year, he authored a bill to extend health care to 580,000 uninsured children.

He says that he wants California to be a place where a success story like his can happen to anyone.

"A great education will be a waste if you don't give back," he said.

"The biggest thing is to make sure we continue to make California a place of opportunity."

ROCK CLIMBING

In order to begin climbing, you need a pair of rubber-soled rock climbing shoes, a harness, a locking carabiner, a belay device, a rope and a partner. Wear comfortable clothing that enables a full range of movement.

A T-shirt and shorts will do, but since the most common injuries are minor scrapes and scratches incurred during short falls, rock climbing pants are sometimes preferred. Bouldering – climbing on low rocks and boulders without equipment – is slightly more hazardous because it is easy to fall off a rock and twist your ankle.

Once you and your partner are in harnesses, the climber ties one end of a rope that is routed up through an anchor into his harness. The belayer, the person who tends the rope while the other climbs, loops the other end of the rope through a belay device attached to his own harness. As the climber ascends, the belayer pulls in the rope and locks it off so if the climber loses his grasp on a hold, the rope will catch him.

In Rock I, top ropes are anchored by the instructors. Each group climbs once or twice on a wall, then rotates with the other groups until everyone has climbed each wall. Some walls are sloped but have almost no handholds, providing opportunities to practice footwork. Other walls require long reaches and more upper-body strength.

After lunch, one of the Outdoor Adventures instructors guides climbers up to the top of a wall to where they can see the anchors holding the ropes. A look at the bolts, webbing, knots and cams reassures students that their lives are in good hands. Climbers then switch sites, and after a brief explanation of how climbs are rated, they spend the rest of the afternoon practicing the techniques they have learned.

For more advanced training, Outdoor Adventures offers Rock II, Advanced Climbing, Anchor Building, a weekend excursion to Fossil Falls and a multi-pitch climb . In addition, the UCLA rock wall is an excellent place to build up strength and improve climbing skills.

At the rock wall, holds are color coded to identify routes of various difficulty by using the Yosemite Decimal System. Approximately 50 routes ranging from 5.4 (easy) to 5.12 (expert) are attainable via 15 different ropes. "I like the control of the UCLA wall, the padded floor, the safety equipment as well as the limited height," Stevenson says. "I also like how the sport necessitates trust between partners. When you play doubles tennis, if someone misses a shot, it's not going to result in a broken limb."

Calm, courage and creativity are qualities needed to rock climb. Much more than a physical workout, rock climbing is an amazing mind game.

According to Ballas, the greatest challenges of climbing are staying focused, controlling your ego and accepting failure. "Your mind says, 'I can't do that. I can't do that,' then you go for the hold and your body contorts in a weird way and you do it," Ballas explains. Other times, the challenge is accepting defeat either by resting on the rope (a cardinal sin for die-hard climbers) or heading back down the rock to try again.

Ballas likes how rock climbing forces people out of their comfort zones. "It's a feeder into being more adventurous in other things in life – realizing that most of what we don't do in life is because of some unfounded fear," Ballas says.

Though rock climbing is physically demanding, there are no prerequisites to clamoring up a wall. Climbers of all ages are out there, and about one third of them are women. Linda Hall, a 50-year-old dental hygienist who began climbing three years ago, says, "When I was on the Prow I said to myself that I was too old at 49 to be climbing 1,900 feet and spending two nights on a portal ledge on the wall. But when I was down safe and sound all I wanted to do was go do it again."

Kelly Pollack, Outdoor Adventures instructor, agrees. "You're on this really tiny ledge and you're standing there 100-feet up and that's fine," Pollack adds. Why is it that climbers get a thrill out of dangling by their fingernails several hundred feet up in the air?

Maybe Don Mellor, author of "Rock Climbing: A Trailside Adventure", says it best.

"Now that our environment is tamed," he writes, "we still feel an urge to put ourselves in precarious positions to fill the void left by the disappearance of the saber-toothed tiger."

DNA

stored in the state's DNA computer database so that the criminals' genetic material can be matched to that left at the scene of crimes, some of them decades old.

Harmon said testing for the state database is lagging far behind.

In Alameda County, only 300 of 700 convicted murderers have had their blood tested at state prison, he told the Orange County Register for Sunday's editions.

"If you're trying to solve an old murder case, it sure would be nice to know all the old murderers are in (the database)," he said.

The California Department of Corrections is working with Harmon to help ensure that blood samples are taken from all eligible state prisoners, department spokeswoman Kati Corsaut said.

"We take this very seriously," she said.

One problem is that a large number of county agencies are responsible for obtaining the blood samples from county inmates and parolees, and their procedures are not uniform.

"Within the state prison system we are receiving the samples," said Mike Van Winkle, a spokesman for the state Department of Justice. "Within the county jail systems, it's not as consistent."

A bill authored by state Assemblyman Kevin Murray, D-Culver City, would spell out guidelines to ensure that samples are taken from offenders who are paroled instead of being sent to prison.

The bill is pending in the state Senate.

The testing problem is not restricted to California. Fewer than half of eligible U.S. sex offenders have been subjected to blood testing, according to a study published in the National Institute of Justice Journal.

"There's a loophole in the system that needs to be closed," said Orange County Deputy District Attorney Mike Jacobs, director of the office's unsolved murder project.

Harmon said he has found one remedy: Alameda County prosecutors make a court-ordered blood test a condition of any negotiated guilty plea to sex offenses or violent crimes.

Mustang Club, enforced the smoking ban in January.

"I even threw a couple of guys out," said Murphy."A guy threw a lit cigarette in my face because I would not tolerate smoking in here."

Murphy started getting reports that nearby bars were cheating.

"People were telling me, 'You're the only guy enforcing this,'" he said. "One bar is renting ashtrays for a dollar to help with the fine."

At the Occidental Grill, co-owner Don Helton longs for the days he could let smokers light up without comment.

"You simply don't take 20 percent of the adult population addicted to a legal substance and tell them they can't do it in a place they've been accustomed to doing it all their lives," he said.

Bar owners also can be cited if they refuse to comply. The first violation will cost a patron or bar owner $100, the second offense within a year will cost $200 and the third $500.

O'Greenberg's is enforcing the new law – and having some fun in the process.

"We're supposed to post the law, so we did – in Chinese," smiled bartender Kathy Castro, pointing to a rectangular sign hanging on the wall.

year the students divide into smaller groups headed by a teacher, community service leader and college student, and participate in a major community service project. The projects are unique: the students do the majority of the work, and the adults merely guide. Past projects include raising money for a battered women's shelter and a school recycling program.

Breen's enthusiasm for this year's project was evident: "They had a clothes drive this year and collected over 3,000 pieces of clothing. The kids did most of it; actually, the adults didn't do anything at all.

"They made posters and went to every homeroom to announce to drive."

"We want them to be exposed to activism," Breen said. Teamworks is partly supported by One-to-One, a nonprofit organization; that day, One-to-One paid for the buses.

"We're always looking for college students to help out at Teamworks. People are interested in something that looks good on resumes and changes lives. We still have kids who stay in contact and call us, and they're in high school."

After the tour and lunch, students participated in games for the whole group, such as "Clumps," wheelbarrow races and other picnic sports.

Then came the revealing of the "one lie" – which turned out to be "that we told you there was only one lie," – and the distribution of prizes which had been donated from groups on campus. There were Bearwear items from ASUCLA, sports posters from Campus Athletics and items donated by the Community Service Commission and Campus Tours.

Abrajano, a fourth-year English and biology student and Mortar Board member, said of the day, "We wanted to be a positive influence and show what UCLA's all about. This project specifically deals with children from the inner city. It was definitely successful."

Nguyen agreed. "We wanted to give them an idea of the college experience."

The children themselves enjoyed the day. Though some had a different perception of what the day would be like – "I thought we were going to a basketball game" – others knew exactly what the day involved and were eager for the tour and having their questions answered.

"I wanted to know the school," said seventh-grader Hector Barrios. He added that he wanted to attend UCLA.

Juan Hernandez also enjoyed the experience: "We had a fun day. It was real interesting, and it's cool to know about the arts and statues and trees."

He also, humbly enough, "wished good luck" to the UCLA students he had met that day. He had only one, mild complaint about the campus: "It's big. You can get lost here."

SERVICE

the speakers at "Multicultural Issues in Community Service."

Service organizations should be aware of their own perspectives, and be careful not to force their culture on others, said speakers Pam Cysner, advisor for the UCLA Center for Student Programming, and youth organizer Lloyd Wilkey.

> "The people who don't do community service weren't (at the conference)."
> Ilana Gotz
> Fourth-year student

Antonio Sandoval, a second-year political science and history student involved with the Community Programs Office, said he hoped to get a lot more volunteers out of the conference. However, Ilana Gotz, a fourth-year communication studies student who attended the conference, said she doesn't think this will be the case.

Although Gotz said that she really enjoyed the conference and found it to be really informative, "the people who don't do community service weren't here," she said.

The conference, in its second year, expanded its attempt to reach volunteers and prospective recruits. Invitations to the conference were given not only to UCLA students, but to other universities and service organizations. This year's conference also offered a wider variety of topics and more speakers.

Joe Balais, part of the CSC and an organizer of the conference, estimates attendance of last year's conference between 50 and 60 people. With increased work and exposure, Balais expected this year's attendance to be between 200 to 300 people. However, actual turn-out was only about 122, including the 35 speakers. Many of those who pre-registered for the conference did not attend, and the number of walk-ins was lower than anticipated.

Organizers seemed pleased with the outcome. Sandoval hopes students can come away from the conference with "a sense of empowerment and the realization that community service is not one narrow thing."

The day concluded with a closing speech by James Washington, UCLA alumnus and former Dallas Cowboy. Washington summed up the day: "We as people make time for what we want to do." As his wife used to tell him, "The best gift you can give someone is your own time."

reforms. The plan calls for abolishing monopolies and other privileges that have made Suharto's family and associates wealthy over many years.

In recent weeks, five people were killed when mobs in more than 20 towns wrecked and burned hundreds of shops and houses owned by ethnic Chinese traders whom they blamed for rising prices of food and other basic goods.

Suharto made no direct reference to the targeting of the Chinese minority but said it "is useless to look for scapegoats."

"I share the sadness of housewives and low-income families in dealing with the skyrocketing prices. The public becomes restless. Even the slightest misunderstanding has sparked greater unrest," he said.

Suharto identified currency stabilization as the key to recovery and voiced frustration that the rupiah's value had not rebounded after plummeting more than 70 percent since July.

He was still "carefully and cautiously contemplating" a plan to peg the rupiah to the U.S. dollar through a currency board system.

The IMF and major industrial countries, including the United States, have cautioned against a currency board, saying it was premature and could wreck Indonesia's chances of recovery.

Former Vice President Walter Mondale is expected to reinforce this message when he arrives Monday for talks Tuesday with Suharto as an envoy of President Clinton.

In recent days, many analysts have speculated that the currency board plan would be quietly dropped.

But Suharto said while any new solutions would need IMF support, ultimately "our fate rests in our own hands."

"I shall not hesitate to do whatever possible to overcome the situation in order to alleviate the increasingly heavy burden on the people's life," he said.

The president's six children sat alongside government ministers in the first rows of the huge wood-paneled chamber during Suharto's one-hour speech in the national parliament building.

NUCLEAR

defending the relevance of nuclear weapons in deterring such potential adversaries.

"The fact that some elements (of the U.S. government) may appear to be potentially 'out of control' can be beneficial to reinforcing fears and doubts within the minds of an adversary's decisionmakers," its report said. "That the U.S. may become irrational and vindictive if its vital interests are attacked should be a part of the national persona we project to all adversaries."

Two years after this document was written, President Clinton approved a directive on U.S. nuclear policy that upheld the "negative security assurance" that the United States will refrain from first-use of nuclear weapons against signatories to the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty. This list includes Iraq, Iran, Libya and North Korea.

The policy, however, includes exceptions that presidential adviser Robert Bell said have been "refined" in recent years. They would allow responding with nuclear weapons to attacks by nuclear-capable states, countries that are not in good standing under the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty or states allied with nuclear powers. Iraq, which the United States regards as violating international atomic weapons restrictions, could be one such exception.

Arms control advocates are concerned that signatories to the Non-Proliferation Treaty who possess no nuclear weapons will abandon the pact if they see the existing nuclear powers preserving their nuclear arsenals and finding missions for their weapons – particularly if those missions include scenarios that involve attacks on them.

Bell, President Clinton's senior adviser on nuclear weapons and arms control matters, disputed that argument in an interview Friday.

"I don't think there's a disconnect in principle between some level of general planning at STRATCOM and the negative security assurance and our goals relative to the Non-Proliferation Treaty," Bell said. Treaty signatories are more worried about their neighbors than the United States, Bell said, and they support the nuclear weapons reductions the treaty imposes on nuclear-armed states.

Of the 1995 Strategic Command document, Bell said, "That sounds like an internal STRATCOM paper which certainly does not rise to the level of national policy."

Navy Lt. Laurel Tingley, spokeswoman for the Omaha, Neb.-based command, said she could not comment on the council's report until it could be reviewed in detail. She restated the command's basic policy guidance that deterrence of attacks involving nuclear, chemical or biological weapons is "the fundamental purpose of U.S. nuclear forces."

goal has been collected by sources in the medical sciences.

In addition to the money being spent on construction, other areas in the medical sciences identified as fundraising priorities include research, endowed faculty chairs and scholarships.

Other areas of investment include $185 million for research efforts and $25 million set aside for scholarships and medical student fellowships, according to Betsabe Mazzolotti, assistant director for administration with the Development Group.

"If you look at faculty support and endowed chairs and allowances that would be included in the whole research package, a good fourth is designated to a kind of research," Meyer said.

Funds gathered by Campaign UCLA are spent as they are collected, Meyer added.

"It's on a current need basis, because the buildings ought to be done by 2003."

Officials expect to far surpass their goal of $600 million by the year 2002, the year Campaign UCLA is slated to end.

"Each unit on campus has defined its needs. We are working very hard at meeting the goals which have been both assigned and which we identified for ourselves," said Gerald Levey, provost of the School of Medicine.

"We have a broad list of needs ... to successfully raise money for. In fact, we have needs that transcend even those we have identified," Levey said.

Priorities are probably still going to change, according to Meyer.

"To be successful we are going to have to raise more than $600 million, and given the rate of success today we probably will," he said.

Party leader Oskar Lafontaine – who suffered a bruising defeat to Kohl in the chancellor's race in 1990.

In a clear attempt to keep Schroeder out of the chancellor's race, Kohl had campaigned heavily in Lower Saxony for Schroeder's rival, Christian Democratic Union candidate Christian Wulff.

Becoming chancellor has long been Schroeder's dream. In the early 1990s, he was quoted as saying he wanted to open an annual trade expo in Hanover as chancellor in the year 2000.

Lore has it that as a young parliament member in the '80s, Schroeder stood outside the chancellery in Bonn after a late night of drinking and called out, "I want to be there!"

ing freshman and transfer students.

The majority of these dropouts were amongst underrepresented minorities and low-income students, making it a particular concern at the conference.

In the past, universities have dealt with this problem by attempting to bring these students up to the academic level of their more privileged counterparts. But that has changed in the last few years as retention programs, like UCLA's Academic Advancement Program (AAP), has raised their goals even higher.

"We, at UCLA and AAP, have undergone an ideological shift from remediation to academic excellence," said C. Adolfo Bermeo, AAP director.

The goal of UCLA's retention programs now is "to emphasize going to graduate school instead of catching up" for these disadvantaged students.

"We need to show (all students) that we respect their skills," said Claude Steele, a professor of psychology at Stanford University, "and we take their prospects seriously."

According to speakers at the conference, the best way to increase students' sense of worth is to increase their participation in their academic curriculum and to integrate them into the overall social atmosphere of the university.

Sylvia Hurtado, an associate professor in the school of education at the University of Michigan, discussed the ways that racial tension and diversity impact a student's transition from high school to college.

In areas where racial tension is high, minority students have a low attachment to the university, and a lowered sense of belonging.

Hurtado pointed out that students tended to succeed at greater rates when they felt an attachment to their respective academic institutions.

Preconceived stereotypes, as well as the overall racial tension at the university, affect a student's ability to succeed.

According to Steele's research, a student's self image profoundly effects their academic performance. In one study, Steele and his colleagues gave a math test on the "outer margins" of the students' ability.

Results indicated that the difficulty of the test caused a perceived "group-based limitation" to impose itself upon the female students, causing them to score 3 times worse as a whole than the male students.

However, when the stereotype that females did worse in math than males was lifted, the females showed a dramatic increase on like tests.

The study indicated that when neither male nor female was aware of the math stereotype, the scores evened out, meaning the male students' scores went down as well.

Steele maintained that the female student places a psychological boundary on herself when put under high stress.

"When the stereotype is on, the students become more cautious and begin to second-guess themselves," he said, adding they tend to feel that they are alone in their plight.

This is what Steel calls "pluralistic ignorance," or the feeling that your social group experiences these problems in isolation, such as an overall female inability to do math. This loneliness is detrimental to student success and consequently lowers retention rates.

Vincent Tinto, a professor in the school of education at Syracuse University, said "that students suffer in isolation."

As a result, Tinto suggested that universities and colleges create collaborative and cooperative learning environments for students.

Tinto used the New Student House at La Guardia Community College as an example of these environments. At La Guardia, students take any four of six basic reading and writing courses during their freshman year.

In Tinto's study of educational methods at La Guardia, one group used collaborative learning techniques in individual class meetings and in groups that continue throughout the life of coursework. These students were compared to a control group who used more traditional methods.

In addition, the students used theatre presentation, role playing and computers in order to develop their writing, reading and presentation skills.

"The groups which developed within the classroom extended beyond it," Tinto found, "providing support which students saw as influencing their desire to continue college, despite the many challenges they faced."

The students in the experimental group had higher pass rates in all but one of the classes in the six course unit, as well as higher occurrences of As and Bs in all but two of the classes.

The data indicates that those within the cooperative learning environments actually learned better and consequently had lower dropout rates.

As Tinto said, "Students who learn, stay and persist."

UCLA is also undergoing changes in the way that introductory courses are being implemented for first-year students.

Like the University of Michigan, UCLA is considering a new general education proposal that will bring learning atmosphere and even freshman seminars to the dorms.

The hope seems to be, as Hurtado put it, to "integrate social life with the class life of the students" at the university.

According to Hurtado, a diverse university can impact all students – not just underrepresented ones – positively. In a well-integrated and diverse environment, students can learn acceptance of other people, tolerance, cultural identification, advanced group skills and leadership.

As well as social skills, these programs advance students' perspective skills, improve their cognitive complexity and their ability to understand the networks that underscore society, Hurtado said.

But according to those who spoke at the conference, the only way to accomplish these gains is for all students to be incorporated into the learning environment.

"Diverse learning means that you can't just bring minorities to the table," Tinto said. "It means that everybody has to be at the table."

Expert Teachers	Kaplan teachers have the best credentials and teaching skills. In fact, the median LSAT score of our teachers is higher than that of Harvard Law School students! And every Kaplan teacher must complete a rigorous national training program. Kaplan teachers average 40+ hours of training before they ever teach a class!	Your instructor may not even have taken the LSAT. And even if they did, have they been trained to teach you to ace the test?
Exclusive Materials	Only Kaplan has the answers and explanations to every released exam—over 2,100 questions from 21+ exams. Kaplan also gives you in-depth explanations, exclusive insight, and effective strategies for every question.	Anyone can buy old LSATs from Law Services. So, don't be impressed by a company that promises to give you a "big book" of LSATs. After all, what good are the questions if you don't get explanations and strategies?
Superior Methods	Kaplan gets you more points in less time. The Kaplan system, including a Personal Study Plan, is the most effective and efficient way to learn. We make sure you use every minute of your preparation to your best advantage. We've got hundreds of practice hours if you need them, but we don't think you will.	Our competitors can't match our proven results. They want you to focus instead on the number of classes or number of hours they offer. But don't be deceived by unnecessary practice and wasteful review. Expert test prep means targeted training.
Proven Results	+7.2 Points—According to a study by Price Waterhouse, Kaplan LSAT students improve an average of 7.2 points. And 9 out of 10 Kaplan LSAT students go to one of their top three school choices.*	One unscrupulous company has been regularly adjusting its score increase claims for years. Sanctions aren't working in Middle East

IRAQ: Children, civilians, not Hussein's leadership, are being harmed by ineffective demands from U.S.

Millions of Iraqis, many of whom are children, are suffocating under the harsh economic sanctions implemented and enforced by the United Nations. Yet under the sanctions, whose sole purpose is to force Saddam Hussein to comply with a U.N. resolution to destroy all biological and chemical weapons, civilians are being dealt the heaviest blows, while Hussein himself remains unaffected. Although the Iraqi people have no control over the nation's policies, they are being punished with sanctions. The United Nations should continue to negotiate with Hussein but lift the sanctions because innocent Iraqis are suffering.

Since Aug. 11, 1990, about a week after Hussein's forces invaded Kuwait, Iraq has been subject to U.N. sanctions banning all exports except for oil sales, under U.N. Security Council Resolution (UNSCR) 986. The sanctions placed limitations on the goods imported into the nation, allowing only food, medicine and other essential products for civilians. The "food for oil" program capped the amount of oil Iraq could sell in exchange for food and medicine at $2 billion per six months. The program has led to disastrous consequences for the Iraqi people, as the government has put a higher priority on importing industrial materials and obstructing the import of food and medicine.

The sanctions have ravaged Iraqi communities. Factories and businesses have shut down. People have lost their jobs and their homes. City buildings are crumbling, and conditions are worsening. A Chicago-based humanitarian group called Voices in the Wilderness, which delivered $40,000 in medical supplies to Iraq in December, reported that over 567,000 children have died from starvation since the sanctions began. A U.N. agency reports that approximately 1 million Iraqi children are suffering from chronic malnutrition as a result of food shortages.

In spite of the startling figures, the United States still insists the sanctions will not be lifted unless Iraq fully complies with UNSCR 687, which set the terms for the Gulf War cease-fire announced Feb. 28, 1991.

Under UNSCR 687, which took effect in April, Iraq was to accept the destruction, removal or rendering harmless of all its nuclear, chemical and biological weapons, and all ballistic missiles with an over 150-kilometer range. Research, development or manufacture of such weapons was also prohibited. Iraq would also be forced to fully cooperate and allow unrestricted access to U.N. inspections teams at any site.

Iraq has thus far failed to comply with the terms of the resolution. It did not provide full disclosure documents on its missiles until July 1996, five years after the U.N. demanded them. The U.N. Special Commission (UNSCOM) is concerned that Iraq may still possess SCUD-type missiles due to conflicting reports supplied by the nation's officials. Warheads, missile components and 17 tons of growth media for biological weapon agents have been unaccounted for in the documents, which has led the U.N. to believe Iraq possesses dangerous and potent military power.

In October 1997, U.N. weapons inspections teams reported that Iraq still refused to disclose complete details of its banned arms program. The United Nations subsequently issued a threat of a trade ban until full cooperation was reached. Baghdad officials refused to allow Americans to participate in the U.N. weapons inspection and announced Americans must leave Iraq in one week. Iraqi officials refused to allow two Americans to take part in the inspections and said it does not fear the use of force.

In November, U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan sent three diplo-

Socialist rebellion could right wrongs of U.S. conquest

MOVEMENT: World's proletariat must unite against capitalism's blatant imperialism, prejudice

By Michelle Oberman

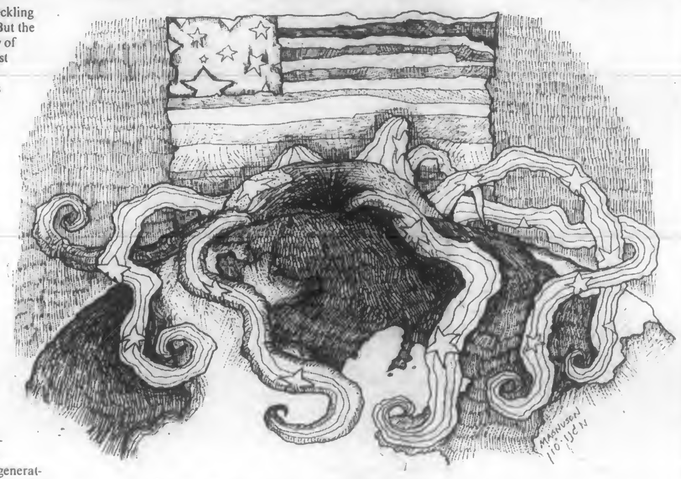
In February, the Spartacus Youth Club (SYC), youth organization of the revolutionary socialist Spartacist League (U.S. section of the International Communist League), held a speakout at UCLA to protest war moves against Iraq. As I write this letter, an agreement between the United Nations and Iraq seems to have been reached. While this may stave off a U.S. attack for now, it does not deter the fight against U.S. imperialism which has murdered over a million Iraqis since the 1991 "Desert Slaughter" through starvation sanctions. We say: U.S.,U.N.,NATO out of the Persian Gulf! Down with the U.N. starvation blockade! U.S. hands off Iraq!

Imperialism is not a policy that can be reformed. It is a stage of capitalism that carves up the world for unfettered economic exploitation, thrusting humanity into horrific world wars where millions of working class and minority youth are slaughtered for capitalist profits. Behind the U.S. military moves in the Persian Gulf are inter-imperialist rivalries of the United States, Japan, Germany and other imperialist competitors which ultimately threaten military conflagration. This is further intensified by the collapse of the Soviet Union, East European deformed workers' states, and by imperialist designs over Near Eastern and Central Asian oil fields and pipeline routes. That's why support from other imperialist powers for the military buildup was tepid, at best.

Domestically, anti-war sentiment has been ubiquitous, with protests across the country drawing thousands. U.S. officials trying to sell this dirty expedition to American workers and youth faced repeated heckling by anti-war protesters. But the pacifist/reformist policy of pressuring the imperialist butchers to pursue "diplomacy" only builds illusions in capitalism and derails the class struggle necessary to defeat U.S. imperialism.

Oberman is a senior sociology student.



The SYC fights to unite anti-imperialist youth behind the power of the proletariat in opposition to increasing militarism. At our Feb. 19 speakout we protested the presence of ROTC on campus, who made clear its purpose to crush student protests and labor strikes when they staged a sinister "mock occupation" of Royce Quad last quarter. ROTC is the government's main vehicle for generating a killer elite, the military's top brass who are responsible for engineering the deaths of millions across the globe. ROTC off campus!

While we unconditionally oppose imperialist war moves against Iraq, we give no political support to the anti-Communist Iraqi regime. It is the job of the Iraqi proletariat, drawing behind it oppressed women, Kurds, ethnic and religious minorities, to sweep away Hussein's regime through socialist revolution. We stand opposed to Israel's bloody Zionism as well as bankrupt Arab nationalism, underlying the need to build an Arab/Hebrew Leninist party to defend the Palestinians and sweep away the sheiks, emirs, kings, colonels and Zionist rulers. The SYC fights to build a multiracial, class-struggling, internationalist workers party, counterposed to the Democratic and Republican parties of war and racism. Our party links the struggle for the emancipation of the toilers of the Near East with the fight for socialist revolutions around the world, especially against the main enemy of humanity – U.S. imperialism. Defeat U.S. imperialism through class struggle at home! For a socialist federation of the Near East!

The post-Soviet "New World Order" was punctured by the 1992 integrated L.A. upheaval which demonstrated the real social tinder at the base of racist American capitalism, but what was lacking was a multiracial revolutionary workers' party like the Bolsheviks who led the workers to power in Russia in 1917. In the United States, such a party must take up the fight for black freedom. Black oppression is the bedrock of American capitalism, enforced in a thousand ways, from the repeal of the meager gains of welfare and affirmative action to fascist Klan terror and murderous cop brutality in the ghettos. Today, these same racist rulers who have killed over a million Iraqis through the harshest sanctions ever imposed on any

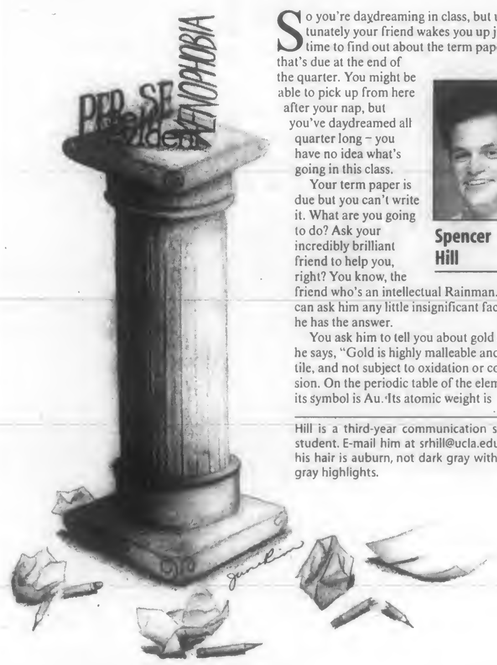
Bamboozle your professor

Using big words and long, convoluted sentences for no apparent reason may not be ethical per se, but receiving a good grade for it from a draconian TA doesn't make you an evil, Machiavellian student



Spencer Hill

So you're daydreaming in class, but unfortunately your friend wakes you up just in time to find out about the term paper that's due at the end of the quarter. You might be able to pick up from here after your nap, but you've daydreamed all quarter long – you have no idea what's going in this class.

Your term paper is due but you can't write it. What are you going to do? Ask your incredibly brilliant friend to help you, right? You know, the friend who's an intellectual Rainman. You can ask him any little insignificant fact and he has the answer.

You ask him to tell you about gold and he says, "Gold is highly malleable and ductile, and not subject to oxidation or corrosion. On the periodic table of the elements, its symbol is Au. Its atomic weight is 196.967 and its atomic number is 79." You know he wore thick glasses when he was younger, but the switch to contact lenses didn't help much. Women don't talk to him. He can't get a date. He's a little insecure (but you're not). And he's brilliant, so when he's out in the real world, he'll have a real job, making real money, and all the women will flock to him.

You're a little jealous of his intelligence and of course you think using money and power to pick up women is wrong, even though you are looking for a "soul mate" based on their physical appearance. But that wouldn't be as superficial as getting a date because you're rich, now would it? You don't need his help though, because success in this class is based on how well you can write a paper, not on how good looking or how smart you are. How are you going to do this? By using the right words, of course. That's obvious – but it's the power words that make any paper sound intelligent, even if you don't have anything to say or have no idea what you're talking about.

Perhaps some of the most powerful words of all, a phrase that you can use whenever you want to, is "per se." This is one of the phrases that really doesn't have any meaning, but will improve your paper because words like "per se" will make you sound intelligent. If you're not sure how to use "per se" in an academic paper, here's an example: "The Graduation Record Examination is not merely a test per se, but a strong indicator of one's potential capacity to succeed in graduate school."

And one of the most important abilities to have is the ability to insult or disagree with someone without saying it to his or her face. One of best ways to insult someone's intelligence right off is to use the words "obvious," "of course" or "self-evident," because what you're saying is: "If you don't get it, you're stupid." So, when you use them in a paper, for example, it sounds something like this: "Such an argument is nothing more than an inconguous malefaction, the corroborating points presented in the aforementioned passages are self-evident and support the rational integrity in believing in humanity's clairvoyant connection with nature."

All this means is: "People have a natural connection with nature and can get along with the environment without destroying it, you stupid idiot. You must be fool to think otherwise." And, if you don't believe that the word "self-evident" is powerful, remember back to the colonial days, to a certain document named the Declaration of Independence, and take a look at the beginning of the second paragraph: "We hold these truths to be self-evident." Translation: "Screw you King George. Love, the Colonists." And then there are, of course, two magic words you should use sparingly. The first one is "draconian." This word is usually used to describe someone or a policy that is extremely severe, cruel or harsh.

Used in an academic paper, it sounds something like this: "The said policy is nothing more than a draconian incantation that obviously belittles the imperative nature of life's

Lesbian sorority had community impact

After reading The Bruin's Feb. 25 article "Delta Lambda Phi returns to UCLA," I am once more amazed at just how brief our cultural memory seems to be as Gen-Xers and a little disappointed at the author's lack of research.

I'm glad to hear that Delta Lambda Phi is returning to UCLA – as will Jeff Stabile, my roommate and a founding member of the fraternity on campus. However, Barbara Ortutay reports that although women on campus are interested in forming a lesbian sorority, "there have not been any concrete steps toward organizing one." As an alumna of Lambda Delta Lambda (LDL), a sorority founded by lesbians at UCLA (in 1988, I believe – before Delta Lambda Phi), I'd like to inform Ortutay and the campus community that this is not the case.

Lambda Delta Lambda received much attention not only on campus (as Ortutay would have known had she made even a cursory search of The Bruin's archives), but also nationally. Its members appeared on national television shows like Donahue and served as grand marshalls of the Los Angeles Pride Parade. LDL provided tutoring and career counseling, challenged the Pan-Hellenic Council and the campus community to greater inclusivity and played a profound and positive role in the lives of its Bruin members – lesbian, bisexual and heterosexual.

With the slogan, "Sisterhood shouldn't require a $2,000 dress," LDL welcomed all women at UCLA. Minimum dues were only $25 per quarter, but would be covered by others if that proved a burden; nobody was ever turned away from any activity for lack of funds. Chapters still thrive at other universities, though LDL shut down at UCLA in 1992.

Should Bruin women be interested in reviving the Alpha chapter of LDL, I'd gladly provide copies of the sorority constitution and the benefit of my experience and enthusiasm.

LDL was a powerful force for positive change both individually and socially on this campus as well as a source of lifelong friends and a lot of fun; it could be so for today's Bruins too. We could even cut the traditional, though much-dreaded, Pledge Karaoke night.

mats to meet with Iraq's Deputy Prime Minister Tariq Aziz. Iraq said it would call off the ban on U.S. inspectors, but quickly recanted after tougher sanctions were put into place.

On Feb. 23, Annan and Aziz reached an agreement in which Iraq would fully cooperate with UNSCOM and allow full unrestricted access to inspectors, even to previously off-limits presidential palaces. U.S. officials have expressed misgivings about the U.N. pact and reserved the right to bomb Iraq.

The United States has been the most vocal supporter and enforcer of the U.N's policies against Iraq when it has agreed with it. Yet the United States is being hypocritical in forcing Iraq into submission while it flaunts the authority to override U.N. decisions. If the United States expects Iraq, or any other nation, to comply with U.N.'s rulings, it needs to respect the body as well. The United Nations, not the United States, is the world-recognized power.

As the United Nations and Iraqi top officials continue to negotiate, the United States must also remain cooperative and respect the terms the United Nations dictates. But foremost, the United Nations and the United States must put an end to the suffering taking place within Iraq. Television crews and media outlets from around the world have documented the terrible conditions millions of Iraqis have experienced as a result of the economic sanctions. Although Iraqi civilians have absolutely no power over what Hussein does, the United States' uncompromising stance on the sanctions has cost over a million Iraqis their lives. Allowing innocent people to die is no way to force Hussein into submission.

Media makes or breaks reputation

Reading Emmanuelle Ejercito's Feb. 11 article "Throwing the towel" about Kris Johnson made me realize how easily a person's image is praised and torn apart through the media.

Earlier this school year Johnson was negatively portrayed by all sources of information. His absence from the team at the beginning of the basketball season was for "undisclosed reasons," yet negative implications followed. TV, radio and newspapers sought different explanations making him "evil or bad.".

The article reverses the negative image created about Johnson and eloquently paints his struggles with his involvement on the basketball team. The article refers to Johnson's love for basketball and shows how his passion pushes him to improve both as a person and as a player.

The inspirational piece praises a young man who was and is still criticized for his attitude on and off the court. It is evident that in a split second the media channels destroy or enhance the life of an individual.

pursuit of self-aggrandizement through the acquisition of liquid currency." Translation: "I want to make as much money as I can. Taxes are a bad idea. The IRS should be outlawed."

The second word is "Machiavellian." This is someone or something which is unscrupulously cunning and deceptive. Maybe you have instructors who are like this. If that isn't enough, here's another phrase that may come in handy: "The intrinsic value of such an ideal strikes to the core of its identity and is integral to present and future study." Translation: "That's a good idea." And, remember, as I'm sure you've heard, professors are paid by the word. Not only are they paid by the word, but by the syllable. It's like a game of Scrabble: the longer the word, the more points you get. And, of course, if you use an "X," you score more points than if you use an "L."

One of the best X-words that's popular right now is xenophobia.

Xenophobia has two definitions, which makes it doubly useful. The first definition is fear of strangers. I'm sure you have friends that are xenophobic. You know, the type that goes to party and won't talk to anyone – they just walk around talking to themselves, which makes them schizophrenic also. But hatred of foreigners or of anything that is strange or foreign is the second definition. So this definition may be the best for the paper.

And if you really want to show off your mastery of the English language you can make up your own words. You may think this isn't fair, but there is an unwritten rule among professors stating that you may make up words whenever you want once you earn your doctorate.

Tertiary seems to be one of those words that can't possibly have a meaning, so it must have been made up by a professor hundreds of years ago. If you're wondering what it means now, tertiary is literally translated as "thirdiary." Yes, thirdiary. There's primary, secondary, and thirdiary or tertiary.

There's one more for you. Now you may be thinking, "I already know all these words." OK. I understand that UCLA is filled with some of the most intelligent twentysomethings on Earth. So if you're skeptical, here's the Porsche of writing tricks. It may cost $100,000 (at grad school) to master it (and may even attract the opposite sex), but for now it'll at least get you an "A" on your paper.

The secret is: cite yourself. You know what I'm talking about. Cite yourself. Professors do it in their writing and some of them even do it in their lectures.

For example: "Hill said, in a column published on March 2, that the words required to join the pantheon of academia may mean something per se, but in actuality may seem to be no more than Machiavellian in nature, but at least you'll get an 'A.'"

But be warned, most people can tell the difference between fools gold and the real thing – you don't have to be Rainman to see that, of course.

Freak magnet tries to uncover love in world of psycho guys

COLUMN: Attracting sane men easy for some; rest get stuck dating weirdos

Larry and Jen left our table at the restaurant/bar/night club to smoke a cigarette. Larry came back alone.

"Where's Jen?" I innocently inquired, hoping she'd been discovered by one of the many cute, young male specimens circulating with beers.

Vanessa Vanderzanden

"Oh, she's talking to some 40-year-old," he answered, as though this were a common occurrence for my 19-year-old suburban-raised roommate. "She's fine."

But I knew she was not fine. And I knew there was nothing I could do to save her. Because I, too, suffer from the same terrible social disease that Jen had succumbed to.

We are freak magnets.

Somehow, we exude a certain aura that has every lunatic crawling out from beneath their rocks and caves to pick up on us. Dirty, old, drunken men seem to be attracted to a friendly quality in us that others, luckily for them, fail to emit. Is it my multi-colored hair that they find so inviting or Jen's double-eyebrow piercings that has these lonely mad men so enamored with our presence?

But before we begin the analyzation of what creates a freak magnet, let us begin by clarifying what we mean by "freak." For starters, we will relate the tale of twistedness which poor, sweet Jen was subjected to on the night in question. The night which had unsuspecting Larry, unaccustomed to the world of freak magnetdom, refusing to intrude on Jen's conversation.

According to Jen, said freak explained in detail how a radio antenna had been implanted on his neck at birth in order to track him and read his thoughts. Apparently, a woman named Mary was then created by "them" to be his mother, but he knew she really wasn't. At some point not too long ago, he was taken to the East coast to have his antenna updated.

Then it gets interesting. You see, a tube runs through his digestive system that regulates his body. But the funny thing is, he still needs vitamins and gets people to buy them for him at Thrifty. Yet he doesn't understand why it is that the Christian engineers, for these are the "they" that have been maneuvering his life since day one, aren't able to regulate his system so that he doesn't need vitamins.

At some point they "shrunk his manhood," and he is currently sleeping on a psychiatric couch in the psychiatric ward of the engineering building on campus. He awaits the day when he will be used to interact with female extra-terrestrials, because he is

In traveling to Salvador, Brazil, Marion Jackson and Barbara Cervenka uncovered diamonds in the rough – rich, vibrant paintings of Brazilian life created by self-taught artists.

Titled "O Pelourinho! Popular Art from the Historic Heart of Brazil," the UCLA Fowler Museum of Cultural History hosts the West-coast premiere of a collection of paintings and iron works through May 10.

"O Pelourinho!," co-curated by Jackson and Cervenka and organized by the University of Michigan and Wane State University, features 61 acrylic paintings that present Brazilian life as experienced by the artists.

"They are representational, narrative paintings," Jackson explains. "They are stories about common life. The artists are using their experiences as inspiration for their work and ... are putting down life as they see it."

The paintings range from scenes featuring plantation workers, street life and religious traditions to images of the city's main square.

"The paintings capture the vitality and the brilliance of African traditions in Brazil," says Betsy Quick, director of education at Fowler Museum. "What we are trying to do is to look at how African beliefs and traditions are re-integrated in new context."

Although the scenes and styles may differ from one painting to another, they share at least one thing in common – fusion of African and Brazilian culture.

Some important aspects of the African-Brazilian culture celebrated in the collection are the integration of Catholicism and the African religion, Candomblé, and the prominence of spiritual culture.

"A lot of paintings show images of Candomblé ceremonies, and these iron pieces are actual pieces from Candomblé shrines," Jackson says. "I think what you get in this show is a sense of how dominant this African-based spiritual culture is. Candomblé figures very strongly as an affirmation of tradition and history and has been a powerful force in keeping a sense of cohesiveness within the community."

A piece titled "The Last Supper," by John Kinnidy, strongly attests to the integration of two religions. The painting depicts Jesus Christ at a table surrounded by apostles. The interracial apostles, however, make the painting stand out from others on the subject. In addition, Jackson points out that the food on the table are favorite foods of the Orixás, which means "god" in Candomblé.

Although these paintings are rich in culture,

MUSIC: Swing band on brink of stardom remains loyal to fans

In case you've been locked in your crusty bathroom for the past year or so, you might be interested to know that swing music has risen from the dead and struck a chord with the younger (and older) cats cruisin' the Hollywood scene. One of swing's resuscitators has been local fave Big Bad Voodoo Daddy, who entertained a capacity crowd to the point of exhaustion last Wednesday night at the swanky Hollywood club, The Derby.

This classy eight-piece outfit has actually been playing The Derby for over three years now on Wednesday nights, bringing all the L.A. hipsters out and "selling out" the popular swing club on Los Feliz Boulevard.

Just as they settled into the cozy comforts of being The Derby's house band, along came Jon Favreau, the young filmmaker who brought cameras into The Derby for his 1996 independent movie, "Swingers." With their scene-stealing performance and the movie's unexpected popularity here in Los Angeles (and the rest of the country), Big Bad Voodoo Daddy became the hottest indie band in the land, eventually signing to Coolsville/ EMI-Capitol Records and landing several television and radio appearances.

Wednesday's performance took on a celebratory feel as BBVD raised their horns to the release of their major-label debut album, out last Tuesday. Despite it being the last Derby gig the band would play until the end of their three-month promotional tour, the fans weren't exactly weeping as BBVD tossed out three sets of swingin' grooves and bouncy jive tunes.

Unlike the somewhat contrived swing resurgence that has hit the radio waves with artists such as the Cherry Poppin' Daddies and the Squirrel Nut Zippers, Big Bad Voodoo Daddy brings a quasi-punk spirit to their retro sounds without the sneering attitude.

Their brassy, '40s-influenced, jazz style pays homage to such swing heroes as Cab Calloway and Dean Martin. Though they play music popularized during the Great Depression and World War II era, they clearly have the pizzazz and charisma of a '90s band.

The scene at The Derby had excitement written all over it. Hordes of retro-outfitted youngsters stood in long, multiple lines waiting to get in to see at least one BBVD set before the night drew to a close. Inside, twentysomethings adorned in zoot suits and classic dresses mingled at the bar, the pool table and on the dance floor with baby boomers and Derby regulars who were actually around when swing first became popular over 50 years ago. The retro furnishings and decor gave The Derby the notion of being the coolest, classiest joint around. A television news crew filmed the festivities as local swing dancers twirled and rocked around the club, and music industry execs shuffled about.

Around 9:30 p.m., BBVD took to the stage, and the fans rushed onto the tiny dance floor, which would take a pounding throughout the night, thanks to the dancin' swingers groovin' to BBVD's scat-like rhythms. Within seconds of the appearance of lead singer and guitarist Scotty Morris, the band burst into smiles and jammed right Fastball, "All the Pain Money Can Buy," (Hollywood) Alternative rock can expect a great new addition to the collection of truly versatile and creative bands out there today. In other words, Fastball has released a second album that doesn't suck. "All the Pain Money Can Buy" combines great hits and rockin' beats to thrill even the rhythm-less at heart.

The album starts off with its best pick, "The Way." The Latin rhythm combined with a great beat inspires one to turn up the volume and piss off the neighbors. One great song after another follows it. The inspiring folk-rock style of "Fire Escapes" and the slow Western theme of "Slow Drags" are two noteworthy standouts. "Which Way To The Top" adds guest vocalist Poe to complement the song's already smooth melody and haunting lyrics.

Their sound combines classic rock, '70s pop-rock styles and soothingly slow melodies. A song from their previous album, "Human Torch," marks one of the few songs of quality in the previously-released soundtrack for "An American Werewolf In Paris." But the new material is sure to outshine the old. If you love it slow, love it fast and love it rockin', then you'll be lovin' Fastball. Michelle Zubiate A-

Various Artists, "Shaken and Stirred: The David Arnold James Bond Project," (Sire) Gadgets, gizmos and sinister villains make up only part of the James Bond-film allure. There was always the girl, and with her inclusion, the presence of the movie-specific theme song. David Arnold remembers these lovely love affairs in the James Bond tradition with his album, "Shaken and Stirred."

Guest artists such as Pulp, Chrissie Hynde and Iggy Pop add their style to the variety of tunes. Somehow, you begin to realize just how romantic an action film can be just by listening to sleek versions of the old melodies. One piece, "Space March," featuring Leftfield, remains purely instrumental, providing a somber electronica rendition of the unfamiliar song.

Fortunately, tracks such as these turn the compilation into a worthwhile musical experience rather than merely a commercially viable gift idea package. There are no cheesy ray-gun noises here or comical, film-dialogue clips. Arnold offers a mature, quality glimpse at the emotional aspect of a spy's world, a little shaken and a little stirred. Vanessa VanderZanden B+

Various artists, "The Big Lebowski," (Mercury) The soundtrack for the new Coen Brothers movie is just as eclectic and unusual as you would expect. With a wide variety of artists, like Bob Dylan, Elvis Costello and Henry Mancini, "The Big Lebowski" soundtrack samples from different genres with no particular coherent order or theme. The music is all over the place, leaving listeners confused and bewildered ... which was probably their intention.

Some of the rock representatives include Elvis Costello's catchy "My Mood Swings," Kenny Rogers and the First Edition's moody and dark "Just Dropped in (To See What Condition My Condition Was In)" and Carter Burwell's cyber-song, "Technopop." Another fun highlight is The Gipsy Kings' fun and bilingually performed cover of the Eagles' hit "Hotel California." The instrumental selections interspersed throughout the soundtrack include a marching romp in "Stamping Ground," an opera selection from "Die Tote Stadt" and Mancini's melodic and seductive "Lujon."

This motley soundtrack should appeal to those who truly want an album with diverse tastes and moods. Just like a Coen Brothers movie, it's quirky and enjoyable, even if you really can't understand all of it. Aimee Phan B+

Natalie Imbruglia, "Left of the Middle," (RCA) It's been good times for women in pop this past year. Here comes Natalie Imbruglia, a 22-year-old singer, by way of Australia via England to the United States. Her debut album, "Left of the Middle," blends two parts purpose-driven pop, a dash of smoky pseudo trip-hop elements and a voice gifted with beautiful range.

No doubt the best disc to come out of the new year, Imbruglia, with the help of ex-Cure member Phil Thornally, pieces together 12 tracks sweeping through the emotional spectrum. The first radio single, "Torn" (actually written by indie fave Ednaswap) is a great pop-song strapping, with its catchy guitar strumming and awkward, lovelorn lyrics. Imbruglia shows off more than just doe-eyed affection on the disc; she bounces from one emotional swing to another with the greatest of ease. On the electrically powered "Impressed," Imbruglia throws in some subdued grrl power vocals reminiscent of Shirley Manson amidst a dance-along bass drum beat. "City," is an honest, blues-grassy rock number about the ills of city life that begs to be sung along.

Besides strong, musical arrangements and Imbruglia's mesmerizing voice, her lyrics suggests a mature look at love, men and relationships, despite her young age. It's almost a guarantee Imbruglia will continue the unprecedented success that woman musicians are enjoying. Imbruglia is ready to join the ranks of the Lillith Fair posse. Trinh Bui, aka Voltron, Defender of the Universe A

Director Makepeace bases documentary on own ordeals

FILM: Difficult emotional trials fuel touching look at life in "Baby It's You"

By Alice Suh
Daily Bruin Contributor

"C-is the way to begin, H-the next letter in, I-am the word, C-was Cecile bird, K-just to fill 'em in. E-up near the N; C-H-I-C-K-E-N, that's the way to spell chicken!"

No, this is not a lesson in spelling. It is actually a cute little jingle the audience can't help but hum after viewing Anne Makepeace's documentary, "Baby It's You," featuring herself, her husband, Peter, and her close relatives. Makepeace admits it is this "extremely silly song" which helped her husband woo her. But, after viewing "Baby It's You," the audience realizes its significance.

Makepeace directed this personal film documenting her private life and the lives of her family members. The documentary is about the ups and downs of life, and how love and support is always prevalent. Unfortunately, documentaries often have been stereotyped as boring and tedious – but this film had many unexpected surprises and outcomes not only for the audience but for Makepeace as well.

One big surprise for Makepeace was when, after hoping to become pregnant by the end of filming, she discovered that she was infertile. She questioned and doubted whether to continue filming since the film's title was selected with future plans for parenthood.

"I went through a period when we realized that we weren't going to have a kid, where not only did I think that the title wouldn't work, but I also felt like that there was no movie," Makepeace says. "There was no point in making the movie,'cause there wasn't the ending that I wanted. But, then I sort of came around to feel that actually the movie as it is is more important because many, many more people have the outcome we had."

> "It was very emotionally painful; and life was painful, and making the movie was painful.
> Anne Makepeace
> Filmmaker

Infertility didn't stop Makepeace from continuing her project. She decided that her title was still perfect.

"Because what happened, our relationship became deeper, and the meaning of the title changed." Makepeace explains.

Although the film focuses mainly on Makepeace and her painful acceptance of infertility, she does not forget to include the lives of her family as well. Her brother Doug is an important character who brings light humor to the film as he considers abandoning the socially accepted standard of monogamy and contemplates the possibility of polygamy. Then there's Makepeace's younger brother, Roger, who prefers goats to children. Her brothers obviously had no problem with Makepeace documenting their personal lives.

"I think that my brothers were sort of flattered that I was interested. They weren't really resistant," Makepeace fondly recalls.

Makepeace also films her husband's family members, including Peter's sisters. There's the artistic Mary who has had a secret abortion because she felt alone and scared, very similar to Makepeace's own secret abortion when she was 18.

But, unlike Mary, Makepeace never confided in her parents about her illegal abortion. Instead, after many years of silence, Makepeace finally opened up to her older relatives whom she believed to be very conservative since she grew up in a puritanical household. But once again she was surprised to find out how supportive her relatives were.

"For the film I wanted a totally different reaction. I wanted them to show how screwed up my background was. So when they were all really great, my first response was, 'this isn't what I want!' But, of course that is what I really wanted. This is what I needed," Makepeace says.

"I wanted them to illustrate how screwed up a puritanical background is, so I expected them to be much more judgmental and to be shocked and disgusted," Makepeace continues.

> (Makepeace's) film earned recognition at Sundance and foreign film festivals.

"Basically, what I really expected them to do was change the subject because they were shocked."

There is also Peter's lesbian sister Ann, who ironically was the only family member with a child whom she shared with her partner. However, Ann died unexpectedly in a car accident a week before her daughter Laura's birthday, adding even more sadness and grief into Makepeace's life.

"It was very emotionally painful; and life was painful, and making the movie was painful. And it was really hard on Peter especially because of things that happened in his family." Makepeace says.

As an obligation and a commitment she made as a professional, Makepeace filmed Laura's birthday party with everyone's consent. She adds, "Nobody was happy about anything then. That was such a weird bittersweet thing."

Makepeace had to deal with her mother-in-law's death as well, which is not shown or mentioned in the film. Instead of letting her sorrows get the best of her, Makepeace succeeded in completing the documentary as well as maintaining her sanity.

"My feeling with the movie is that it actually does have a happy ending, and I believe that," she comments.

Her hard work and devotion did not go unnoticed. Her film earned recognition at Sundance and foreign film festivals.

"I guess I didn't really expect to get the attention it did get. It got an incredible amount of mention in the press. I got such a great response that I kinda thought that I might win something. When I actually didn't win a prize, that was sort of disappointing. I had gone in not expecting that, but then when the

Although these paintings are rich in culture, narrative and color, they are not celebrated at the national level. In fact, these paintings are simple, straightforward and resemble folk art.

"These artists are ... self-taught and are considered marginal in Brazilian culture and live in very modest conditions," Jackson says. "What we are trying to do is to give access and validity to the experience of the common people. It's kind of a celebration of that."

Although these paintings, for the most part, are considered marginal by the upper-Brazilian society, they are appreciated by the tourists.

"I think what makes them attractive to tourists and so valuable as souvenirs is that they really capture the spirit and the life of the streets of Salvador," Jackson says. "It also gives concrete access to their experiences and values just by looking at their art."

In addition to the paintings, the exhibit features iron pieces used in Candomblé ceremonies. All the iron pieces in the exhibit are forged by an artisan who began his career as an apprentice to a metal worker at a young age.

"He's a very strong believer in > (The paintings) share ... the fusion of African and Brazilian culture.

Candomblé, and he loves to make these liturgical pieces ... with deep religious meanings in addition to other iron works," Jackson says.

Jackson and Cervenka originally began working on the exhibit to gain a better understanding of the African artistic traditions and the influence of the African culture on the Americas. "O Pelourinho!" not only gave them a better understanding of the influence and the artistic traditions, it gave them a chance to bring contemporary Brazilian art to various cities in the United States.

"Art can be a very powerful vehicle for understanding cultures," Jackson says. "This show is important in that it brings to North America, for the first time, a body of work that gives access to the experience, the history and spiritual value of the common people of Northern Brazil in their own voices."

THEATER: "O Pelourinho! Popular Art from the Historic Heart of Brazil" runs through May 10 at the Fowler Museum. Admission is $1 with UCLA I.D., $5 for adults, $3 for seniors and non-UCLA students, UCLA faculty/staff and Alumni Association with I.D. Admission is free to everyone on Thursdays and Sundays. For more information, please call (310) 825-4361.

DADDY

into "You and Me and the Bottle Makes Three Tonight," one of BBVD's most popular songs, also featured in "Swingers."

Morris introduced the well-cherished tune with an introduction that reflected their new major-label success.

"We're Big Bad Voodoo Daddy, and in case you haven't heard, we've got a new album out, and we're promotin' it tonight!"

The crowd hit the roof.

Song after song, whether they were kinetic, shoe-stompin' ditties or slower, jazzier tunes, the crowd moved along during all three sets. Yes, three sets.

Big Bad Voodoo Daddy pulls out all the stops for their fans. With their fan-friendly rapport, nice-guy attitudes and between-song anecdotes, Morris and the boys distinguished themselves from other young, success-bound bands. This, of course, is a huge part of their appeal. It would seem the loyalty the band has for its fans is stronger than the loyalty the fans have for their favorite band.

BBVD paid tribute to such legends as Calloway, with their show staple, "Minnie the Moocher," and performed other faves such as "Mr. Pin Stripe Suit" and "King of Swing."

The band also dove into material featured in "Swingers," which you could tell was the reason why most of the new fans came to The Derby. One of the most awkward things about the crowd and aura at The Derby involves all the wannabe hepcats that can't exactly keep the rhythm, stand still and look really pretentious or really out of place. Next to the hardcore swing fans, it certainly looks funny, especially the too-cool, black-jacketed "Trent" (the charismatic character from the movie) wannabes. But nothing less can be expected.

Big Bad Voodoo Daddy's delivery was, as expected, flawless. Much like their two-hour-plus show at the Wadsworth late last year, the band performed each song with precision and panache, and with smiles across Morris and bassist Dirk Shumaker's faces all throughout the set. Most impressive was the four-piece brass set, highlighted by trumpet player Glen "The Kid" Marhevka and tenor saxophonist Karl Hunter.

The band would even jump into the crowd and take its breather during intermissions among the faithful below them. Clearly, BBVD is at that point before stardom that allows them to hop over that barrier that keeps fans from their band. With the charm and style of such a polished and talented band, BBVD is sure to keep their heads from exploding and egos in check as inevitable success looms ahead of them. Let's just hope they'll come back to The Derby periodically and remember those who love them best.

the only specimen capable of the job. Which makes sense, when you think of all of the regulating the Christian engineers have been doing on his body.

He then, appropriately, asked Jen, as he slapped his hands together, if she liked to be "fucked" or, melding his hands together more softly, "Fu-ck-ed." At that point, Jen left the conversation and returned inside. She realized just then that her friends needed to talk to her.

But this was not Jen's first experience with her body's natural tendency to lure in weirdos. After all, just two weeks ago a guy at a party asked her if she enjoyed the taste of her own body fluids. It seems he found the experience erotic.

Then, there was the toothless man up in Humboldt County who acknowledged her as his "soul sista." He expressed a desire to dance the jambalya with her so that their "auras would meld." And then he warned her to stay away from crack because it will "fuck up your life."

My own tendency to collect lovable loonies began at an early age. Back home, my best friends would always get young, intelligent, extremely hot men to fall irresistibly in love with their dreamy eyes. I got Eddy the child molester.

He was a nice enough old, homeless man who imparted wisdom from the streets in the outdoor cafe we frequented. You could usually smell liquor on his breath, but he did no harm, and once in a while liked to rub my hand and give me hugs. And then one time he told me how he left his wife and kids years ago without a word of goodbye because he had an urge to touch his children that he couldn't fight any longer.

When I think about it, I guess he did the right thing. And I appreciated that he felt he could tell me. But I'd rather have had the cute guy with the shaved head who worked at the ale house next door to talk to, like my best friend Enion did.

And then this past summer, when I frequented the taverns in Seattle, every barfly within 20 miles could pick up my scent. One guy told me and my brother that he met the Doors – the year after Jim Morrison died, of course. And there was the blind, old drunk with a rat-furred mutt, "Toto," who used to come around when we'd be drinking beers on the porch, giving me hugs and saying he had "no friends in this town."

And there was the 40-year-old Fox-executive coke dealer who kept calling me when he wasn't overseas, and the construction worker across the street who had a 2-year-old kid, wanting to take me camping. And let's not forget Eric, the homeless man whom I let take a shower at our place and sleep on our lawn one night. Another guy I met at the Jimi Hendrix memorial told me how he sleeps in a tent with only his puppet to talk to.

I just felt bad for all those lonely people. Maybe I shouldn't have given them the time of day, but I always want to be a nice person. Some people need someone to be nice to them.

But sometimes, I know my bounds. Like the guy Kym and I met outside of the Goodwill thrift store in September, who introduced himself and then asked us if he could make us dinner. We declined the invitation, but bouncing alongside us, he assured us he wasn't crazy and added, "but we know each other now. We're friends."

But this wasn't enough to twist our arms.

Liz, my other roommate, also knows her powers as freak magnet and attempts to wield her force with courage. Just a few months ago, an old man whom she met at the airport during a layover said he found them a cozy spot where they could sleep. It was in the corner, just big enough for two of them.

He then told her how he had just broken up with his girlfriend, which was sad because "Men need women, and women need men." He then asked her to travel with him to Vegas.

After a brief consideration, Liz opted to return to Los Angeles instead. We feel she made the right decision.

For myself, I am proud to say that

> I guess the bottom line ... is that like attracts like. I would hate to be so normal that only normal people talk to me.

within the past few years, I have acquired the ability to attract some less than freaky guys as well as the strange ones. However, my skill at enticing nuts and screwballs still far exceeds my talent at attracting decent young men. In fact, even the decent young men I manage to attract seem to be just a bunch of weirdos once I get to know them.

I guess the bottom line, though I hate to admit it, is that like attracts like. I would hate to be so normal that only normal people talk to me. My freak-magnet power sometimes seems so strong that I often forget what "normal" is.

But I still look forward to that day when Mr. Tall, Dark and Handsome will approach me from across the room. I still have faith that my non-judgmental mindset, like that of fellow freak magnets Jen, Liz and all of you out there that feel our pain, will one day work in my favor. Maybe I will even find a male freak-magnet with whom I can share my burden.

MAKEPEACE

response was so fabulous I kind of hoped," Makepeace says.

Despite the fact that she did not win any awards at the festivals, Makepeace feels that it was an honor just to be showcased at them. That's impressive considering she had no funding for about a year. And when she finally did get funding it was a small budget of $250,000. But it turned out that even this small amount was more than enough for Makepeace.

"I finished for less than what they actually gave me; I gave them back $20,000," she recalls.

One would assume after completing this extraordinary film and earning worldwide recognition, job offers would be pouring in for the filmmaker. But, she says, "No, it doesn't necessarily work like that. I kind of work for myself."

She's not wasting any time either. Her next project is a documentary about photographer Edward Curtis. And, although documentaries seem to be her main line of work right now, Makepeace is interested in working on other things such as dramatic feature films. Her goal in the next 10 years is to have directed three feature films and two documentaries. It's pretty ambitious for Makepeace, who's been through so much – yet very possible.

FILM: "Baby It's You" can be seen this summer on PBS as part of the POV series.

why run all over the place when you have free access to apartment listings here on campus? looking for a place to live can be a real drag, and it's not like you've got all the time in the world. so who wants to drive around with their head out the window trying to read the type on those tiny "FOR RENT" signs? how are you supposed to know what an apartment will cost in Santa Monica or Brentwood or Palms? and is it close to the bus? wouldn't it be great if there was an office on campus that kept track of all stuff for you? well maybe this is your lucky day because community housing does that and more. you can look at apartment listings, or maybe you want to share a house with a couple friends. find a roommate-on-line even. you know you have free access to all this as a ucla student. you can even post listings for free or pick up some bus schedules. just give us a call at 825-4491. it wouldn't be a bad idea to get some info on how to get all of your security deposit back either since the only thing you need more than extra time, is extra money....

Congratulations to Our 15 Senior Spotlights!

Bruinlife Yearbook would like to congratulate the 15 winners of the Senior Spotlight Award.

We would also like to thank all who expressed interest and took the time to apply.

Good luck and continued success in your future endeavors.

The Senior Spotlight Award was developed to recognize distinguished UCLA seniors. These talented students are chosen from a large number of senior applicants, each of which has excelled in many areas during their career at UCLA. Each year these "spotlighted" graduates receive a special page in their honor in the senior section of the Bruinlife Yearbook. This special recognition of outstanding seniors is unique to Bruinlife and is only one of the many interesting ways UCLA and its students are captured in the yearbook.

Today, Bruinlife would like to recognize Catherine R. Trinidad for her outstanding achievements. Read about her, along with these fourteen other Senior Spotlights, only in this year's Bruinlife Yearbook:

was out with an ankle injury but returned to the competition floor at Friday's meet. Bhardwaj competed in one event – bars – and received her season high in that event, a 9.85.

"Every time I try to rest someone, I can't. I was trying to rest Stella at the meet but I had to put her in to compete for Carmen," Kondos said.

"The injuries will effect the scores in this respect but they will move on. We have actually been very lucky injury-wise. Most teams have season-ending injuries, at least one if not multiple."

Although she was not scheduled to compete, senior Stella Umeh came through for the team on floor scoring a 9.925 which placed her at No. 3 in that event.

Heidi Moneymaker was also successful on floor (9.875) with a new tumbling pass, a whip to a double back, that she had learned just last week.

Other successful performances of the meet came from Lena Degteva and junior Kiralee Hayashi. Degteva tied for first place in all-around competition, her second consecutive win this season.

Hayashi competed in three events and hit either her career or season high on vault, bars and balance beam. On vault, Hayashi placed third with a career high 9.90.

Another career high came on beam with a 9.90 which placed her in second. Hayashi reached a season high on bars with a 9.85 tying her for second place.

past Jonathon Riley during the first 800 meters before finishing the 1,600 meters with a split time of 4:03.

Since the race was held at an altitude, the NCAA will knock 4.5 seconds off the 1,600 meter split time, making the team's official time 9:37.30, which places them second in the nation behind Arkansas.

"It was a spectacular race the whole way," Larsen said. "Obviously, (the team) was really on. They wanted to qualify (for the nationals). It was more than we expected."

Damian Allen did what more than was expected of him in the 200-meter dash. Despite soreness in his legs, Allen won the race in 21.16 seconds, only one-hundredth of a second off the automatic qualifying time for the NCAA championships. But the time may be good enough to get him into the championships as a provisional qualifier.

Jim McElroy finished second in the 200 meters in 21.59. Freshman

Bryan Harrison made his collegiate track and field debut in the 200 meters and finished fifth in 21.84.

In the 55-meter dash, Allen finished fourth in 6.31 seconds and McElroy placed sixth in 6.37 seconds. Brandon Thomas finished ninth in 6.42 seconds.

Luke Sullivan set a personal record in the 35-pound weight throw. Sullivan's throw of 66 feet, 10 inches was good enough to get him third place at the meet and an excellent chance, Larsen feels, of making it to the nationals.

Redshirt freshman Steve Michaels also set a personal record at the meet.

Michaels, competing in the pole vault, leaped 16 feet 9 1/4 inches to finish 10th overall. He shattered his previous best by over four inches.

"(Michaels) looked good," Larsen explained. "He's improving and getting stronger."

Rich Pitchford placed second in the high jump with a leap of 6-11. Lester DeRaad finished seventh with a mark of 6-9. Travis Haynes finished sixth in the shot put with a put of 59 feet 6 1/2 inches.

Mel Moultry leaped his way into fourth place in the triple jump with a mark of 49 feet 2 1/2 inches. Gerimi Burleigh placed fourth in the 55 meter hurdles in 7.62 seconds.

With the NCAA Indoor Track and Field Championships rapidly approaching in two weeks, the UCLA women's track and field team continued their preparations for the outdoor season with the USA Indoor Championships this weekend.

Held in Atlanta, Ga., the site of the 1996 Summer Olympic Games, the Bruin women had three representatives entered at this highly competitive indoor meet.

On Friday, freshman Erica Hoernig's seasonal best mark of 11 feet 11 3/4 inches in the women's pole vault earned her a sixth place finish overall. This improves on her provisional qualifying mark and is one inch off her personal best.

Sophomore Seilala Sua finished fifth in the women's shot put on Saturday afternoon. Her top throw of 53 feet 5 1/2 inches was two feet off her seasonal best, which has already earned her an automatic berth in the championships. Former Bruins Valetya Althouse and Dawn Dumble, competing for Reebok, finished second and fourth respectively. Althouse took runner-up on a tiebreaker.

In the 20 pound weight throw, senior Rachelle Noble placed fifth with a throw of 59 feet 4 1/4 inches. Noble has already earned a provisional berth. She can compete in two events at the championship meet by earning a provisional berth in the shot put at the Northern Arizona Last Chance Meet next weekend in Flagstaff, Ariz.

BASEBALL

Byrnes said. "By far the worst series of my career."

It has also been the worst of times for the Bruins (8-10 overall, 3-5 in the Six-Pac), who had lost six games in a row before Sunday's victory. The losing streak almost came to an end at home on Saturday when UCLA's Eric Reece struck out to end a ninth-inning rally – allowing No. 2 USC (14-3, 4-2) to prevail 10-9.

Friday at USC, the Bruins were almost shut out by Trojan pitcher Seth Etherton. UCLA scored the only run of a 6-1 defeat with two outs in the bottom of the ninth.

"We lost a lot of tough games, so it was good to get this one," said Atkins, who went 7 for 14 against USC. "I hope we're on the right track and we can get a winning streak going."

The Bruins jumped to a 6-2 lead in the third inning, but the Trojans responded by tying the game 7-7 by the seventh inning. UCLA head coach Gary Adams came out continuously to calm his young players – especially freshman starter Jon Brandt whose curveball made many Trojans buckle their feet.

The lack of panic in the Bruin clubhouse helped spearhead the five-run eighth inning.

"I don't want the guys to ever say 'Here we go again,'" Adams explained. "The words should be 'Let's overcome it.' We've had a lot of 'Here go we again' this season, but we gotta say 'Let's overcome it.'"

This "let's overcome it" philosophy could be why UCLA junior outfielder Eric Valent tried to steal second base in the ninth inning with no outs and a one-run lead.

The Bruins have experienced many defensive and pitching problems in 1998. Perhaps Valent wanted to secure the game with a bigger lead, but in baseball a stolen base in this situation is a sign of disrespect. Therefore Trojan pitcher Mike Weibling proceeded to throw three inside pitches at Byrnes as a warning to UCLA.

Weibling's final pitch seemed like an intentional pitch aimed at plunking Byrnes in the back – the pitch barely missed Byrnes and ended up on the backstop.

"It had to be intentional," Byrnes said. "Maybe it was because of the steal ... and they had to send a message that you shouldn't run in that situation."

The apparent attempt to injure a Bruin hitter left a sour taste on the day. However, the struggling Bruins may have turned their season around.

"That was (Valent's) call and a bonehead play," Adams said. "He had the 'no-go' sign on. 'No-go' means don't steal. He could've gotten his teammate killed. That was a bonehead play, and it made me mad."

For the UCLA baseball team, it was the best of times, it was the worst of times.

UCLA regroups to beat Fresno State

M. TENNIS: Sunday's win will hopefully restore momentum

By Stephanie Chan
Daily Bruin Contributor

The roller coaster analogy is overused, yet very appropriate. At this point the UCLA men's tennis team finds itself climbing back up after losing three of their last four matches.

On Sunday, the No. 2 Bruins beat a fighting No. 51 Fresno State.

Jean-Noel Grinda, the Bruins' No. 1 player survived a tough first set before defeating Fresno State's Peter Lucza 7-5, 6-3

Hampered by an Achilles tendon injury, UCLA's No.2 player, Vince Allgere was defeated by Fresno State's Andy Scorteanu 4-6, 2-6.

Matt Breen dominated Fresno State's P.J. Dormire in the first set 6-1.

"The second set ... I let him back in a little bit, but I was strong enough to close it out in the end," said Breen as he finished off the victory with a 6-4 second set.

In the No. 4 match it was Fresno State's Olivier Le Jeune who was able to close out the longest match of the day against Alex Decret. Le Jeune took the first set, 6-4, but Decret battled back to take the second, 6-3. The match was decided in the third set. Le Jeune ultimately defeated Decret 2-6.

"I was too loose on too many important points and he wasn't," said Decret.

Chris Sands had a solid win at the No. 5 spot. Sands decisively beat Fresno State's Kevin Viera 6-1, 6-2.

Freshman Noah Newman gave the Bruins the win by defeating Fresno State's Rob Cheyne 6-3, 4-6, 6-0.

"The first couple sets I was a little tentative, but then I just started being aggressive. I started taking it to him," said Newman.

In doubles play, the Bruins were aggressive and won all three matches. Breen and Grinda defeated Le Jeune and Dormire 8-4; Decret and Newman defeated Mullins and Scorteanu 8-6; and Allegre and Sands defeated Luczak and Viera 8-3.

In fact, Henderson, who missed his first nine shots, but finished with 20 points, knew he was going to be called before the play even occurred.

"I could see (the refs) looking already," he said. "I knew we were in trouble and something bad was going to happen when we were trying to stop the ball so close to the basket."

MacCullough made both of his free throws to give the UW the 95-94 lead, and when Johnson missed a desperation heave at the buzzer, the floor was mobbed by Husky revelers.

But if the Bruins played the first half like they did the second, things would've been different.

UCLA made nine turnovers in the first 10 minutes, committed seven fouls in the first six minutes and shot a 38.2 percent clip and missed 10-of-15 from within five feet of the rim.

But then in the second half they played with tenacity and a desire to win – scoring 64 points and connecting on nearly 60 percent of their shots.

Nobody exemplified the dramatically different tales of the two halves than Bailey. In the first half he missed all three shots. But he simply took over the final 20 minutes, making 13-of-17 field goal attempts, including 3-of-4 three-pointers to spur the Bruin comeback attempt.

"I just wanted to win the game really bad," Bailey said. "I let down my team in the first half and I wanted to redeem myself. I was hitting shots and my teammates saw that I was hot so they kept getting me the ball."

In this case, however, the comeback was just too little too late for the Bruins – a team that usually escapes with a win after playing only solid 20 minutes.

But they know come tournament time in a couple weeks, that 20 minutes won't be enough to go past the first round.

Like Kris Johnson said: "This one really has to sink in. If it doesn't, the season has already sunk."

Bruins stylin' at Pac-10 tournament

SWIMMING: Team loses to Stanford, but individuals do well

By Steve Kim
Daily Bruin Staff

UCLA hosted the Pac-10 swimming championships last weekend with several individual highlights but placed behind powerhouse teams from Stanford, USC, Arizona and Cal.

The Bruins started well on the first day of competition with Cindy Bertelink placing fifth in the 500 freestyle, Beth Goodwin breaking the school freshman record with a third place finish in the 100 butterfly and Keiko Price placing third in the 50 freestyle.

The biggest moment for the Bruins came on the second day when Lindsay Etter tied the Pac-10 conference record in the 100 breaststroke. She clocked-in at 1:01.28 to match USC's Kristine Quance's 1994 record.

"I was so surprised," Etter said. "I set goals before the meet and usually, I make them harder than I think I can do. But this meet I surpassed them, which is just amazing. The energy of the team and cheering pulled me through."

Another Bruin, Amber Wines, placed third that race after a poor preliminary swim.

"In the prelim, I felt slow, so my coaches told me what I should do to fix my stroke to get it better," Wines said.

And better she got. Wines and Etter, along with Price, Goodwin, Bertelink and multi-talented Jill Jenkins have qualified for the NCAAs.

UCLA head coach Cyndi Gallagher says although their relays will suffer in the championships because two of their much needed sprinters haven't qualified, the Bruins will do well in the individual events.

"You know, we want to beat everybody just like everyone else," Gallagher said. "But we just don't have the depth this year. Even then, we had great swims and the people that made the NCAAs are potential top-eight placers."

UCLA divers showed solid results that added to the combined scoring this weekend. In the platform event Delilah Moore, Anne Baghramian and Tracy Wilcox consecutively occupied the fourth, fifth and sixth places.

> Despite several sparkling performances by Bruins, there was no question Stanford took the spotlight in these championships.

Rose Huelskamp turned in the highest performance by placing third in the three meter spring board.

"I had fun and, basically, when I have fun I dive well," Huelskamp said. "The pressure didn't impact me as much as it could have considering this year was the most competitive Pac-10 diving meet I've experienced in four years. We all had a great time."

Despite several sparkling performances by Bruins, there was no question Stanford took the spotlight in these championships.

The Cardinal dominated and continued its Pac-10 winning streak to make this meet its 10th consecutive victory.

Stanford won most of the relay events, which have added point value. Misty Hyman, a world champion swimmer, took first in the 100 and 200 flies as well as the 200 backstroke.

Her teammate, Olympic gold medalist Catherine Fox, won the 50 and 100 freestyles and 100 backstroke.

"I feel really good about this weekend because it's been a pretty rough year for me," Hyman said. "Transitions like going to college and being a freshman, being gone from school for a month for the world championships – I don't think I've slept in the same bed for 10 nights in a row. I'm really pleased with my time considering the ups and downs with my training. It's nice to come through and help the team."

For veteran competitor Fox, approaching the championships with a focused mind has helped her with multiple victories.

"It's never just another race," Fox said. "It's always a new experience, honestly. You have to get ready for each race, prepare for it mentally and individually. It's sometimes easier to get there when the crowd's behind you."

Even after 10 consecutive Pac-10 victories, Cardinal head coach Richard Quick still finds this sport challenging and exciting. For the next few weeks, he is keeping an eye on redeeming his team against defending national champion USC in the upcoming NCAA championships.

"Every year we have a new group, and we work really hard," Quick said. "I'm pleased with how we swam, and we're looking to build off this for the NCAAs."

Medley runners relay promise of NCAA challenge

TRACK: Keflezighi boosts Bruins past Stanford; women make strong showing at Indoor Championships

By Alvin Cadman and Donald Morrison
Daily Bruin Contributors

The UCLA men's track and field team can thank Stanford for its assistance at the Mountain Pacific Sports Federation Indoor Championships Friday and Saturday in Reno, Nev.

The Cardinal's help, UCLA head coach Bob Larsen felt, enabled the Bruins' distance medley relay team to automatically qualify for the NCAA Indoor Championships in two weeks.

The relay team, consisting of Mark Hauser running the 1,200 meters, Michael Granville in the 400, Jess Strutzel in the 800 and Mebrahtom Keflezighi in the 1,600, pulled away from Stanford toward the end of the race to win in a field house record time of 9:41.80.

"The guys put a stamp on the meet by ending it the way they did," Larsen said. "Everyone was talking about the medley relay after the meet. They ran fast at an altitude (of 4,700 feet). It helped that Stanford was there to push us."

Stanford finished second in 9:44, but the race wasn't decided until Keflezighi grabbed the baton with 1,600 meters left. Gabe Jennings and Hauser battled for 1,200 meters until Jennings pulled away from Hauser at the end of their leg. Granville then gave UCLA the lead after his 46-second 400-meter split.

Stanford's Michael Stember caught Strutzel during the 800-meter leg and the two handed the batons off at the same time. Keflezighi then raced

CALIFORNIA SPORTS

Knicks 101, Lakers 89

The New York Knicks played one of their most inspired games of the season Sunday, getting 32 points from Allan Houston and overcoming injuries and a height disadvantage to defeat the Los Angeles Lakers, 101-89.

John Starks added 16 points and Charlie Ward 15 for New York, which held the Lakers to just one field goal over the final 6 1/2 minutes and kept Los Angeles 17 points below its league-leading average.

The lack of personnel and nagging injuries didn't stop the Knicks from forcing the game to be played in their favored style – a slowdown, defensive battle, and New York kept Shaquille O'Neal from getting involved in any way during the fourth quarter, holding the 7-foot-1 center to just one point and no rebounds.

The Knicks outscored the Lakers 33-18 over the final 12 minutes and kept Los Angeles from grabbing a single offensive rebound.

O'Neal had 19 points to lead the Lakers, but shot just 6-for-16.

Cavaliers 102, Warriors 82

Shawn Kemp scored 28 points, including 14 in the third quarter, as the Cleveland Cavaliers handed the Golden State Warriors their third straight blowout loss, 102-82 Sunday night.

Kemp shot 10-of-16 from the field, was perfect on eight free throws and grabbed 12 rebounds. Zydrunas Ilgauskas added 17 points and 13 rebounds.

Jim Jackson scored 18 points and Clarence Weatherspoon had 17 for the Warriors, who lost for the third time in four days – all by at least 20 points.

The Cavaliers led 24-21 after the first quarter and 50-46 at the half.

Donyell Marshall's slam dunk with 9:18 left in the third quarter cut Cleveland's advantage to 57-56, and the Warriors seemed primed to challenge Cleveland down the stretch.

But the Cavaliers picked up the pace with an 8-2 run, Kemp made five shots and four free throws in the quarter and Cleveland went ahead 84-70.

Blues 6, Ducks 2

Brett Hull, facing Anaheim for the first time since Tomas Sandstrom broke his left hand in a slashing incident, had two goals and two assists to power the St. Louis Blues to a 6-2 victory Sunday over the Mighty Ducks.

Pierre Turgeon had two goals and two assists as well for St. Louis, while Chris Pronger and Steve Duchesne also scored en route to the Blues' sixth victory in eight games and first in their last five meetings with the Ducks.

Jamie McLennan, the Blues' No. 1 goaltender for at least the next month because of Grant Fuhr's knee surgery on Saturday, started consecutive games for the first time with St. Louis. He made 23 saves to extend his unbeaten streak to eight games (6-0-2) since his previous loss on Nov. 29 against the Islanders.

The Blues' easy victory was costly, however. Center Darren Turcotte suffered a bruised hand less than 12 minutes into the game – while sitting on the bench – as teammate Al MacInnis inadvertantly slammed his stick along the top of the boards. Right wing Blair Atcheynum broke a finger and MacInnis also begged off early because he didn't feel well.

Matt Cullen and Scott Young scored for the Ducks, who played their third consecutive game without NHL goal-scoring leader Teemu Selanne and will continue to miss Paul Kariya for an indefinite period because of post-concussion syndrome.

While resting for NCAA Regionals, Bruins drop match to Washington

W. GYM: Injuries trouble UCLA more than the meaningless loss

By Christie DeBeau
Daily Bruin Contributor

The five consecutive meet winning streak for the UCLA women's gymnastic team came to an end Friday night in Seattle. However, in a sport where the win-loss record does not matter, the Bruins were still victorious.

Fifth-ranked UCLA scored a 194.425, a score only slightly below last week's meet totals. The Bruins broke 195 twice this season but were not able to raise their scores high enough on Friday to beat No. 13 University of Washington's 195.900.

DERRICK KUDO

Kiralee Hayashi had a season high 9.85 on the beam at Friday's meet in Washington.

> Head coach Valorie Kondos' goal of the meet was to rest gymnasts as the team moves closer to NCAA Regionals.

UCLA's loss at Friday's meet was the end of its sterling record against the Huskies, a record that had not been tarnished in 24 meetings.

However, UCLA head coach Valorie Kondos' goal of the meet was to rest gymnasts as the team moves closer to NCAA Regionals. Kondos competed only five gymnasts on two of the events instead of the maximum number, six.

"I found out that this was the first time Washington had ever beat us and people asked me if I would have done things any differently had I known this, but I wouldn't have," Kondos said.

"I was not going for the win at the meet, our win-loss record does not matter. You have to get the ego out of the way. We went with five competing on the floor and five on vault. I was trying to rest people. But Carmen Tausend tore her ACL on bars. She finished her routine, landed her dismount and then grabbed her knee. This is the first time we have had a season-ending injury in four years."

Senior Tausend had returned to the team in October, after she retired last April, and was finishing up her career as a Bruin this year.

Tausend's injury is not the first one to plague the Bruins this season. Less than four months ago, junior Susie Erickson broke her foot and only returned to competition two weeks ago. Fellow junior Luisa Portocarrero injured her ankle and is not back in action.

W. BASKETBALL: Seniors final game at home ends with convincing win

By David Arnold
Daily Bruin Contributor

With 25 seconds left in the game, all four seniors left the floor for UCLA. And that ended an era for Bruin basketball.

It was an era that saw coaches and players change, tournament hopes that didn't come true and four young women who sweat it out on the floor of Pauley Pavilion.

It was Senior Day on Sunday for UCLA's women's basketball team and for Tawana Grimes, Carla Houser, Jamie Oenning and Aisha Veasley that meant their 96-72 win over Washington would be their last in Pauley Pavilion.

"I guess it really hasn't sunk in yet," said Grimes, who finished her Bruin career with 11 points in 29 minutes as the only senior starter. "I think because it's a big game for us."

And a big game it was. After a 80-74 win over Washington State last Friday, this game concluded a season sweep of the northwest schools, including those in Oregon. It raised the Bruins record against ranked teams to 2-4, and after Arizona lost to Stanford on Saturday, nearly assured them of a second place finish in the conference, a significant improvement over last year's sixth place finish.

The game itself wasn't the blowout it seemed until the second half. Though the Huskies shot only 36 percent from the floor in the first half and Bruin sophomore Maylana Martin scored all 16 of her points before intermission, early Bruin fouls kept Washington in the game.

"We sent them to the line way too much in the first half," said UCLA head coach Kathy Olivier, "but we played some very good basketball."

Good enough that with 3:46 left in the game, Olivier put all of the seniors in the game, allowing them all to score before taking them off, with 25 seconds left, to a standing ovation from a crowd of 2,292.

"It was a emotional night," said Oenning, "I'm not going to be playing basketball in this kind of environment again."

"I was telling myself 'don't cry, don't cry,'" said Veasley, who ended up teary-eyed anyway. "I didn't expect to go out there and bawl like I did. It was very emotional for me."

"We've got a long way to go," said Houser, remembering the final two games in Arizona and the team's tournament possibilities. "The Bruins aren't finished yet."

Rearranged schedule, lineup brings No. 2 Bruins win, loss

W. TENNIS: UCLA falters vs. Pepperdine, regains footing by trouncing No. 37 UNLV

By Jared Hummel
Daily Bruin Contributor

The recent struggle continues for the No. 2 UCLA women's tennis team.

The Bruins (7-4 overall, 2-1 Pac-10) traveled to Malibu on Friday to take on No. 10 Pepperdine in a game rescheduled from Feb. 3.

UCLA head coach Stella Sampras elected to switch up the lineup in hopes of ending the Bruins' recent slide.

She dropped junior Kati Kocsis from the No. 3 position to No. 5. Senior Kelly Rudolph and freshman Cristina Popescu both moved up one notch to Nos. 3 and 4 respectively, and junior Brandi Freudenberg moved up one slot to No. 6.

The result: another loss.

Despite sophomore Annica Cooper's continued torrid play, winning her 10th singles match out of 11 tries, the Bruins dropped the dual match by a score of 6-3.

UCLA lost four of its six singles matches and two of its three doubles.

Despite their woes of late, the Bruins have been seeing good tennis play from Popescu who, having recently been released from the injury list after a muscle pull, won both her singles matches and both of her doubles.

Popescu now has a dual match singles record of 6-1.

However, all was not lost for UCLA as it managed to salvage its weekend on Saturday afternoon by defeating the No. 37 Lady Rebels from the University of Nevada, Las Vegas.

UNLV entered play with a 3-2 record after dropping both matches to the Arizona schools last week.

Friday's loss to the Waves prompted Sampras to mix up the lineup once again.

Sampras rewarded Popescu for her recent stellar play by moving her up to the No. 2 position from No. 4.

Popescu showed that she was up to the challenge by defeating sophomore Veronica Goude 3-6, 6-3, 6-1.

Cooper defeated Kocsis' sister Susie 6-3, 6-4 while struggling sophomore Elizabeth Schmidt fell in the longest match of the day 6-2, 4-6, 7-5 at the No. 3 slot.

Doubles play was impressive for the Bruins as they won two of three when Rudolph and Cooper combined to hammer Goude and freshman Britta Gabl 8-0, and Brandi Freudenberg and Popescu defeated the duo of sophomore Lisa Annebro and freshman Marcella Valkenhoff 8-2.

The Bruins' only doubles loss came in the No. 1 position when sophomore Katia Roubanova and Schmidt were beaten 9-7.

Despite the loss, UCLA's No. 1 doubles player, Roubanova, continues to heal from her foot injury which had kept her out for the first six dual matches of the season.

The Bruins will return to action on Wednesday against Boise State at the Los Angeles Tennis Center and again on Friday at USC.

40 minutes is 2 seconds too long for UCLA

The Associated Press

Toby Bailey avoids Washington's Thalo Green during UCLA's 95-94 loss Sunday.

M. BASKETBALL: Dismal first half gives way to fantastic second half, but No. 18 Bruins succumb to Washington as time expires

By Brent Boyd
Daily Bruin Staff

SEATTLE – For 40 minutes Sunday, it looked as though there just wasn't going to be enough time for the No. 18 Bruins.

But in a cruel twist of fate, there proved to be just two seconds too many for the UCLA men's basketball team.

In a furious second-half rally, UCLA fought back from a 16-point halftime deficit to take its first lead of the game with 12 seconds remaining, then watched all its work get wiped away when Todd MacCullough connected on two free throws in the waning seconds giving Washington a 95-94 victory in front of 6,527 at Edmundson Pavilion.

"It's a tough loss to take," senior forward Kris Johnson said. "We gave it our all today, we left it all out on the court. When you work that hard and come back and keep scratching and crawling, we usually get the win. We're just not used to it."

It was the fourth loss in eight games for the struggling Bruins (21-7, 11-5 Pac-10) and at the same time, gave a tremendous boost to the tournament hopes of Washington (17-9, 10-7).

"It was a great basketball game," UCLA head coach Steve Lavin said. "I felt we played well in the second half, the way we're capable of playing."

Behind Toby Bailey's 32 second-half points (which tied a school record), UCLA gradually battled back from its 46-30 halftime deficit, but it looked as if time would run out on the Bruins when they still trailed 92-87 with under a minute remaining.

But then in the wildest and wackiest 44 seconds of the Bruins' season, UCLA completed its dramatic comeback – only to surrender the lead and game at the bitter end.

Two free throws by J.R. Henderson and a layup by Bailey cut the Huskies lead to one with 30 seconds left, and then when the Huskies' Thalo Green was fouled and missed one of his two free throws, the Bruins had possession down 93-91 with 0:26 left.

Then Johnson – three days after clinching a win at Washington State with a three-pointer at the buzzer – made another trey with 12 seconds remaining to put the Bruins on top for the first time all game.

When the Huskies brought the ball back down the court, Bailey stripped Dan Dickau – both UCLA's Rico Hines and Dickau held on to it, forcing a jump ball with 0:21 left.

With the possession arrow pointing Washington's direction, UW inbounded the ball from behind the Bruins' basket.

And everybody in the arena knew what was coming – a lob to the 7-foot 1-inch MacCullough.

With his distinct height advantage over the Bruins' tallest player – the 6-foot 8-inch Henderson – MacCullough had dominated UCLA all game, as he led the Huskies with 25 points on 9-of-12 field goal shooting and 7-for-7 from the free throw line.

The lob never came, however, as Henderson fouled MacCullough before the ball could even be inbounded.

"There was a screen by the guard and they had done it before, so I was real prepared for it," Henderson said. "I closed my fists so the refs would see I wasn't holding, but obviously it didn't work."

Top-ranked team loses battle, wins war

VOLLEYBALL: Flyers steal a game but can't stop UCLA from taking match

By Grace Wen
Daily Bruin Staff

It finally happened.

Someone finally took a game off the UCLA men's volleyball team.

The Bruins, who have grown accustomed to sweeping opponents, lost a game for only the third time this season. It didn't matter for the Bruins, however, who prevailed 15-8, 15-4, 14-16, 15-4 over Lewis University in just a shade over two hours.

Once again it was a balanced attack that gave the undefeated Bruins (15-0, 10-0 Mountain Pacific Sports Federation) another win. Four players hit in double figures with middle blocker Adam Naeve hammering a team-high 25 kills to go along with a team-high 12 digs and four blocks.

UCLA's senior captain Tom Stillwell spiked 17 kills and served 4 aces while opposite Evan Thatcher also had 17 kills. Outside hitter Fred Robins added 10 kills to contribute to the Bruin effort.

Despite an outstanding 35-kill performance from Flyer junior Victor Rivera, UCLA outhit Lewis .435 to .320.

Although the Bruins had the same number of kills as the Flyers, hitting errors made the difference as UCLA had only 17 compared to 31 for Lewis.

Serving was also key to the match, since top-ranked UCLA posted nine aces compared to only one ace for the Flyers.

UCLA continues to outserve opponents with its mix of blistering jump serves and tough float serves.

Stillwell did the most damage with his float serve but Naeve and freshman Mark Williams both stunned the Flyers for two aces each while Ben Moselle had one.

On the defensive end, the Bruins outblocked the Flyers 8-7 but were outdug 48-42.

The match definitely wasn't as stressful as last year's, in which it came right down to the wire in the fifth game before UCLA won 24-22. Although it wasn't the quick sweep that UCLA head coach Al Scates had hoped for, the Bruins did walk away with another win.

UCLA will play another non-conference match on Tuesday night against Loyola University of Chicago. The Ramblers are off to their best start with a 13-2 overall record and a No. 9 ranking in both the AVCA and Volleyball Magazine polls.

BASEBALL: Disrespectful steal attempt aside, win will turn season around

By Vytas Mazeika
Daily Bruin Staff

When Eric Byrnes stepped up to the plate in the eighth inning on Sunday, the 1,440 fans in USC's Dedeaux Field could sense that something big was about to happen.

"(Eric Valent) could've gotten his teammate killed. That was a bonehead play, and it made me mad."

Gary Adams
UCLA baseball coach

Byrnes, a senior outfielder for the UCLA baseball team who would be involved in an ugly scenario in the ninth, was 0 for 13 in the series before his eighth inning at bat and the pre-season All-American was due. So when Trojan pitcher Craig Jones hung a slider, Byrnes drilled a single into center, and Bruin second baseman Jack Santora came around to score the eventual winning run.

The next batter, freshman third baseman Garrett Atkins, drilled a three-run homer over the right field wall to put the game out of reach.

"It's the worst series of my career; I will tell you that much right there,"

Manager claims harassment case delayed

COMPLAINTS: Employee believes UCLA Dining Services not handling investigation properly

By Scot Sargeant
Daily Bruin Contributor

UCLA Dining Services may have dragged their feet on investigating a case of harassment relating to sexual orientation, according to one of its employees.

The employee also claims that attempts to file investigations and instigate reforms have received little attention from Housing Administration directors.

Heather Hassinger, on-campus senior meeting rooms manager, is one of four employees in the past five years from Dining Services who have complained of harassment relating to their sexual orientation.

"I'm disgusted with the whole situation, how they are handling the situation. As far as I can see now, changes aren't happening. It leaves the door open for this to happen to someone else," said Hassinger.

Officials from Housing Administration, which oversees Dining Services, say they have taken the necessary steps to investigate the situation.

"We are required to utilize existing campus human resource policies," said Michael Foraker, Director of Housing Administration.

Hassinger, who is an out lesbian, joined the Meeting Rooms Department last May. She claims she began encountering sexual harassment from her employees in August. At first, she found offensive comments written about her that referred to her sexual orientation.

One case of graffiti, in which sexual comments were engraved on the stone columns in the basement of Covel Commons, particularly disturbed Hassinger.

"At that point, I let my boss know I was furious. I was scared – now I was being threatened. I let her know that I was having a hard time functioning as a manager here," she said.

Hassinger then met with Agnes Warren, director of administrative services, and Nina Purtell, manager of personnel and payroll, both members of the Business and Finance department.

"They explained that they wanted to do a full-on investigation of my crew," she said. However, the idea didn't appeal to Hassinger because she

In preschool, when she devotedly watched "The Price is Right," Laura Rosenberg never imagined she would be on the show.

She never envisioned herself winning $10,500 in a game of "Plinko."

Or foresaw her winning a 1998 Mustang Convertible in the Showcase Showdown.

Laura Rosenberg, come on down.

When Rosenberg, a second-year undeclared student and Hedrick Hall Resident Assistant (RA), came to UCLA, one of her wishes was to attend a taping of "The Price is Right." Arranging the trip was difficult, however, and the opportunity didn't arrive until she was an RA. But she jumped at it, arranging sign-ups on her floor. By October 1997, she called and made reservations for 20 spots in the audience for the earliest time possible – January of 1998.

So on that Wednesday morning Rosenberg awoke and prepared for the trip; at 10 a.m., before the group left, Rosenberg and others turned on the TV to watch "The Price is Right"

Lt. Gov. looks to increase community college funds

EDUCATION: Government to improve school system with more opportunities

By Marisa Wong
Daily Bruin Contributor

In a plan to increase funding for California community colleges, Lt. Gov. Gray Davis announced last week his intention to continue lowering fees, provide better teacher compensation, and strengthen relations between colleges and the private sector.

The Davis plan would hopefully improve the community college system, which has a high number of part-time faculty and spends $2,200 less than the national average on each community college student.

There are currently 1.45 million students, who attend 106 community college campuses. According to Davis, California's community colleges receive less government support than any other college system in the nation.

"The under-funding has cut on the backs of teachers," said Patrick McCallum, executive director of the Faculty Association of California Community Colleges. "If we are going to maintain a quality system where people have a strong education so they can transfer to a UC, then we are going to need quality funding."

First, Davis intends to lower or freeze student tuition so that students are not prohibited from attending college because of high fees.

Last year Davis sponsored the College Affordability Act which cut per-unit costs at the community colleges from $13 to $12 and wants to assure students that these fees will not be raised any time soon.

"No student who meets the academic requirements of this system should be turned away for financial reasons," Davis said. "Allowing costs to prevent even some Californians from maximizing their full potential through a college education will ultimately impose staggering costs on all of us."

Next, Davis said he plans to increase the number of full-time instructors and improve benefits for existing part-time faculty.

Part-time workers do not currently receive any benefits and Davis aspires to provide these employees with such benefits as health insurance and paid office hours.

Whereas community college classes are often not available, cancelled or overcrowded, the Davis plan would hopefully promote a stable faculty that is able to provide quality education.

"We are not at the level we should be and there is clearly a need for expansion," said Michael Bustamante, spokesperson for the Office of the Lieutenant Governor. "The only way to do it is to provide benefits. The importance of the contribution the faculty makes has been underscored."

"People are talking about the need to invest in our community colleges."

Gray Davis
Lieutenant governor

Finally, Davis said he plans to continue establishing relations between the business sector and community colleges for those students who are interested in entering the job market after college.

There are currently five programs in the state where businesses from the private sector work with students in community colleges which provide preparation and training for entering the business force. Davis plans on adding to these.

"Every trade or profession imaginable is now affected by the technology revolution and every student must be equipped with the skills needed by employers," Davis said. "We must do more than just add more computers in the classroom. We must use the opportunities of the private sector partnerships to guarantee that our students are training for the real world."

Bustamante said that the general funding resource for Davis' plan has not yet been identified and that Davis just announced a blueprint for what he wants to see at the community-college level.

However, with the passage of the California Affordability Act, which also lowered fees at the University of California and California State level

Med Center allies with Orthopaedic Hospital

UCLA Medical Center and the School of Medicine have signed an agreement with the downtown Orthopaedic Hospital, which will provide increased community healthcare in downtown Los Angeles.

Under the agreement, UCLA will provide Orthopaedic Hospital, located on Flower Street, new outpatient clinics in pediatrics, women's health and family medicine. The new services will allow Orthopaedic to double its number of patients to approximately 150 per day. The clinics will be financially supported by UCLA, as will the free care given through the Orthopaedic Hospital's International Children's Program.

Orthopaedic Hospital is the most comprehensive treatment facility in the Western United States for musculoskeletal conditions in adults and children.

In 2003, Orthopaedic Hospital will move inpatients to the Santa Monica/UCLA facility. Currently, the Orthopaedic Hospital sees about 18 inpatients per day.

In addition to the clinical benefits, "the new relationship will bring together two outstanding orthopaedic research laboratories which will focus on bio-medical engineering and the genetics and molecular biology of bone disease," said Gerald Levey, provost of the school of medicine.

Both organizations will remain independent, with their own governance boards and separate budgets.

UC assistants find help in Sacramento

Three Sacramento lawmakers lent their support to unionization efforts of UC teaching assistants on Monday, urging the UCs to recognize tutors, readers and teaching assistants (TAs), collectively known as academic student employees (ASEs.)

"For a union to get the kind of support it has at UC and for the UC to ignore this is unconscionable," said State Assembly Speaker Antonio Villaraigosa. "A public university that receives such a high level of funding from the state ... should respect the fact that the workers have spoken."

Villaraigosa appeared with Assembly members Dion Aroner and Fred Keeley at a press conference in Sacramento, where UAW-SAGE presented 5,000 letters from ASEs, calling for union recognition.

SAGE has received increasing support for their campaign in the Assembly: This summer, 32 legislators wrote to the UCs asking that they support TA unionization.

UC letter drive seeks more federal aid

UC Berkeley students, in conjunction with students from other UC campuses, participated in a letter drive to Congress last week in an attempt to lobby for increased financial aid.

Chapter members from the California Public Interest Research Group on seven of the nine UC campuses are organizing the event. Members said they plan to send letters and videotaped messages collected on UC campuses from Tuesday through Thursday to Rep. John Kasich, R-Ohio, chair of the House Budget Committee.

"We are asking students to mail letters to Kasich to make him aware that students in California want increases in financial aid allocations," said ASUC External Vice President Sanjeev Bery.

The letter asked Kasich to take a series of steps to "protect access to higher education."

The letter requested an increase in graduate fellowships, a decrease in student loan costs and a raise in the maximum for a Pell Grant to $3,400 for the 1999 fiscal year.

"In the past five years, the average federal loan debt for students at four-year schools has risen by $4,400," the letter stated. "It is becoming more and more difficult for students to afford a college degree."

In 1927, students expected to see a Romanesque bridge (top) joining the ravine which once separated Murphy Hall from Royce Quad. The bridge (middle) was the first structure built on the Westwood campus, but today (bottom) it acts as a walkway into campus.

Though presently buried by tons of earth, grassy hills and brick walkways, a closer look at the road into UCLA reveals a bridge to the past

Maybe you've noticed that little white sign at the Murphy Hall intersection that reads: "Do not exceed 10,000 lb. g.w. on this bridge."

Maybe you've thought to yourself, "Bridge? What bridge? I don't see any bridge," then shrugged and dismissed the notion.

Chances are, you've walked across the bridge many times without realizing it. The low brick walls leading from Murphy to the flagpole were its guardrails, preventing people from plunging down the 40-foot drop to the bottom of the arroyo it spanned.

The bridge was erected when construction began on the Westwood campus in the late 1920s. Trucks rumbled across, transporting the materials necessary for building Haines, Kinsey and Royce Halls as well as Powell Library.

After construction was completed, the bridge served as the main entrance to UCLA until the late 1940s, when it was almost completely submerged in a sea of dirt to create new building sites for the expanding campus.

Today, the bridge houses emergency generators, pipes and electrical conduits while maintaining the distinction of being the first structure completed on UCLA's Westwood campus.

Built in 1927, the bridge was designed in the Romanesque style and served as a better alternative to transporting building materials via Westwood Boulevard, up the hill where the Janss steps are now located.

Later, the bridge conducted heavy foot traffic as students crossed this main thoroughfare to campus. Referred to as simply "the bridge," alumni recall the dramatic changes it has seen over the years.

"During my time on campus, late '30s, early '40s, there were lots of rabbits running around," said Jim Klain, a class of '43 alumnus. "Once in awhile you'd see a deer."

An alumna, Ann Sumner, graduated in 1926 from the Southern Branch of the University of California – as UCLA was known during its reign on Vermont Avenue. She returned to UCLA in 1932 as a staff member.

"We used to be able to look down and see the stream," she said. "It came down from the hills of Westwood and ended above Le Conte."

During the Great Depression, there was at least one documented story of someone living under the bridge.

According to Andrew Hamilton and John B. Jackson's book about the history of UCLA, "UCLA on the Move", one night a janitor had discovered a young woman whose father had suffered major losses in the 1929 stock market crash. He could no longer afford to fund her tuition or expenses.

"Because she wanted to finish college, she decided to stick it out," said Hamilton

Arrests

An alleged sex offender was taken into custody by the university police (UCPD) this week after there were reports of his lewd conduct in the Dance building; after being cited, the man was transported to West Hollywood Sheriffs Jail.

Two men were charged with assault after attacking an access monitor at Sproul Hall. Both subjects were under the influence and transported to West Hollywood Sheriffs Jail. In addition the two men were charged for trespassing after notice.

Theft

This week was productive for burglars, who not only struck buildings, but cars and lockers too. Two laptops were stolen in separate instances; a $500 laptop from Campbell Hall, and a Macintosh model 170 from the Center of Health Sciences worth $750.

A locker in the Men's Gym was broken into on Thursday; an unknown suspect cut the lock and removed $100 in currency. The day before, credit cards and $180 in currency was taken from Sproul Hall. Bunche Hall was a location for burglars this week, where a $300 leather jacket was removed. A television and spectra link phone were missing from the Center of Health Sciences at a total loss of $940.

In addition UCLA was plagued with many instances of petty theft this week, with backpacks and their contents being the prime targets. One backpack was removed from Covel Commons, and two wallets and a cellular phone were removed from backpacks in various locations on campus.

Twenty-nine pills of Zoloft were taken from an outpatient medicine cabinet in the Neuropsychiatric Institute Nursing Ward. In another instance narcotics were removed from the Medical Plaza on Feb 9. A calculator worth $75 was stolen from Anderson School, and a $600 Black GT lightning Men's 21-speed bike was taken from the Wooden bike racks. And two books were taken from a desk at the Powell Library on Friday.

feared the effect that an investigation would have on her crew.

"I didn't want to do that because every time we question the crew, they rebel even more," she said. "I feared for my life at that point, and I let (Housing Administration) know that."

Instead, Hassinger simply asked to have the graffiti removed immediately, and to have pictures of the graffiti taken. However, the engravings were not removed immediately; in fact, Hassinger says it took nearly two months and several requests for Dining Services to finally remove the writing.

Both Purtell and Warren declined to comment on the case.

According to Hassinger, Business and Finance told her that because she turned down the initial offer to fire her entire crew, and to file an official complaint, little could be done to resolve the issue.

Another case of vandalism, which appeared on her office door, led Hassinger to question her employees, trying to find the source of these problems.

A meeting room crew member admitted to writing the comments, and proceeded to resign. However, as he was walking away, he yelled obscene sexual comments at Hassinger.

"I let my boss know, because now I was really concerned. I didn't trust this guy as far as I could throw him," she said.

This led Hassinger to file a full complaint, saying that she feared for her safety. Her boss, Dayna Kenniston, area director of dining services, said that they would research the issue in an internal investigation within the Housing Administration.

But Hassinger feels that little attention was paid to conducting the investigation. In terms of the crew member's case, "nothing ever came of it," Hassinger said.

Kenniston was unavailable for comment.

In October, the managers of Dining Services received an unsigned letter from a former employee, saying that harassment against gay and lesbian employees had taken place, and that managers had done nothing to mitigate the situation. In the letter were names of employees who had sexually harassed Hassinger.

Hassinger asked for the letter to be used in the investigations. She was told, however, that because the letter was not signed, it could not be used as evidence.

A few weeks later, Hassinger decided to question how the Housing Administration investigation was proceeding, but she says she never received any answers from Purtell or Warren.

Hassinger feels that the investigation has been handled haphazardly. She claims she was denied information on the investigation and was told that the photos of the engraved comments had not developed.

She was then directed to UCLA's Human Resources department. Here she was told that her only option was to file a complaint against her department.

Because she was receiving conflicting reports from various departments, and she didn't believe that filing a com-

U.N. warns Iraq of consequences

RESOLUTION: Security Council to take action if inspection deal violated

By Robert H. Reid
The Associated Press

UNITED NATIONS – The Security Council reached a tentative agreement Monday on a resolution warning Iraq of "severest consequences" if it violates an arms inspection deal.

But the agreement came only after several members insisted on guarantees that it would not give automatic approval for a military attack if Iraq breaks the accord.

The council scheduled a vote for Monday evening after diplomatic sources, speaking on condition of anonymity, said China became the last of the 15 members to agree to the oft-revised text.

"This is a very clear, strong resolution that we are very pleased with that will now go into force," U.S. Ambassador Bill Richardson said before the vote.

Since last week, the British and Japanese, who sponsored the resolution, have circulated several versions in an attempt to satisfy all council members. The original draft warned Iraq of "severest consequences" if it violated the accord.

That was softened Friday to "very serious consequences," but in an apparent attempt to placate Washington, the "severest consequences" phrase was reinserted into the text on Monday.

But the difficulties encountered in reaching a consensus cast doubt on the Clinton administration's claims that if Iraq violated the deal there would be strong international support for military action.

During lengthy meetings throughout the day, envoys from such countries as Brazil, Costa Rica and Portugal, which normally support the U.S. stand against Iraq, made clear they opposed any resolution that would give Washington a blank check for an attack if Iraq doesn't honor the accord.

"It is very clear that only the Security Council has the authority to approve an armed military action," said Costa Rican Ambassador Fernando Berrocal Soto.

The United States has maintained that it has sufficient authority to use force under several resolutions enacted since 1991. But France, Russia, China and others dispute that interpretation.

In Baghdad on Monday, Iraqi Deputy Prime Minister Tariq Aziz told CNN the proposed resolution is an attempt by the United States and Britain to lay the foundation for an attack.

The resolution would endorse an agreement reached last week in Baghdad by Secretary-General Kofi Annan that allows U.N. inspectors to visit eight presidential palaces. The Iraqis had placed the palaces off-limits, calling them sovereign sites.

Police continue violence against ethnic Albanians

FIGHTING: Surrounding countries fear clash may erupt into separatist war

By Dusan Stoyjanovic
The Associated Press

PRISTINA, Yugoslavia – Riot police fired water cannons and tear gas Monday at tens of thousands of ethnic Albanians, clubbing them as they fled into side streets in Pristina. It was the third day of violence that some fear could ignite broader regional fighting.

Hundreds of policemen waded into a crowd of 30,000 ethnic Albanians protesting the deaths of compatriots in clashes last weekend. Those confrontations claimed at least 20 lives.

The violence in Serbia's restive Kosovo province has alarmed the international community and heightened fears of a wider conflict in the Balkans. Serbia is the dominant republic in what is left of Yugoslavia.

Some worry the clashes could lead the province into a war of separation similar to those in Bosnia and Croatia.

In Washington, State Department spokesman James P. Rubin condemned the violence and said the ranking U.S. diplomat in Belgrade has protested to authorities in Serbia and Yugoslavia.

"The United States expects the Serbian police in Kosovo to act with maximum restraint," Rubin said. "Further state-sponsored violence would only deepen Belgrade's isolation and dim prospects for the integration of (Yugoslavia) into the international community."

Rubin added that U.S. sanctions against Belgrade will remain in place until authorities there "have taken meaningful steps to address the legitimate grievances" of Kosovo's Albanian community.

The United States also has called on ethnic Albanian leaders to condemn actions by the Kosovo Liberation Army, he said.

Kosovo Albanians, who make up more than 90 percent of the province's 2 million people, have been pushing for independence from Serbia, which abolished the province's broad autonomy in 1989.

Congress weighs several plans to reform managed health care

LEGISLATION: Regulation to improve care but still ban malpractice lawsuits

By Dan Freedman
Hearst Newspapers

WASHINGTON – Two Senate moderates, Sen. James Jeffords, R-Vermont, and Sen. Joseph Lieberman, D-Conn., unveiled legislation Monday that would regulate managed health care but leave intact the rule barring most malpractice lawsuits against managed care companies.

The senators' measure parallels the health consumer "bill of rights" extended by President Clinton two weeks ago to federal employees and retirees and to those in the armed services.

Both approaches call for easier access to emergency room care, full disclosure of information about health care plans so consumers can compare them, and outside appeals when managed care companies deny coverage.

The Jeffords-Lieberman measure, if approved, would apply to the 157 million or more Americans in private, employer-sponsored managed care plans.

"Americans are losing confidence in the quality of care they receive from our health system," said Jeffords, chairman of the Senate Labor and Human Resources Committee. "People are now worried that managed care only manages costs and, in effect, rations care."

The Jeffords-Lieberman bill is the latest in a batch of legislative proposals aimed at addressing public concern that managed care is a roadblock to quality health care. In managed care, health plans and insurers control costs by monitoring patient access to specialists, hospitals and medical testing and technology.

Drinking, gambling may be up on ballot

SACRAMENTO – New drinking and gambling ballot initiatives are being readied for petition drives for spots on the primary election ballot in 2000.

One initiative, by Marcus Alli and Ricci Cornell of San Francisco, would extend the hours for night clubs and bars from 2 a.m. to 4 a.m. on Fridays, Saturdays, Sundays, holidays and days immediately preceding holiday. It would also impose an additional tax on alcoholic drinks sold after 2 a.m.

The other, by Jasmine Mgrdichian of Monterey Park, would direct the California Horse Racing Board and California State Lottery to jointly develop and implement programs using new technologies to increase racing and lottery programs and increase state revenues from them.

The attorney general's office said Monday that the measures have just been submitted for titling and summary. When that is completed, the secretary of state's office will set the time limits for collecting signatures.

Court says Boy Scouts' gay ban discriminates

TRENTON, N.J. – The Boy Scouts of America suffered its first legal defeat Monday over its ban on homosexuals when a state appeals court ruled it discriminatory and said a gay scoutmaster should not have been expelled.

Eight years after James Dale was kicked out as an assistant scoutmaster because he is gay, the court said "stereotypical notions about homosexuals must be rejected."

The ruling came as the Boy Scouts are fighting court challenges to its exclusion policies around the country.

In California, for example, the state Supreme Court is expected to rule this month on two discrimination lawsuits, one filed by a man who was expelled because he is gay and the other by twin boys who were thrown out because they do not believe in God.

The Boy Scouts said it would appeal Monday's decision to New Jersey's Supreme Court.

Spokesman Gregg Shields said the Scouts "have long taught traditional family values, and a homosexual is simply not a role model for those values."

Dale, now 27 and working in New York for a publishing company, said he was elated by the decision.

"This is everything that I was taught in the Boy Scouts, that justice will prevail," Dale said. "It's a wonderful victory for scouting."

After 12 years in scouting, Dale was expelled in 1990 after the group learned from a newspaper article that he was gay. He sued.

A lower court judge ruled in the Scouts' favor in 1995, calling homosexuality "a serious moral wrong" and agreeing with the Boy Scouts that the group is a private organization and has a constitutional right to decide who can belong.

Activists protest lifting trade sanctions

BUSINESS: United States may restore Vietnam to 'most favored nation'

The Associated Press

SANTA ANA, Calif. – Activists from the nation's largest Vietnamese immigrant community are fighting efforts to end U.S. trade restrictions on the communist country.

Activists based in Orange County have put together a nationwide network to keep Hanoi from obtaining the "most favored nation" trade privileges that the United States grants most countries.

The activists have linked with 16 other immigrant communities to bombard the White House and the State Department with messages, said Van Tran, a Westminster attorney who helped launch the coalition.

"We can't keep on legitimizing that bloody regime," said Chuyen Nguyen of Stanton, a former South Vietnamese fighter pilot.

Southern California is home to about 300,000 Vietnamese immigrants, two-thirds of them clustered around Little Saigon in northern Orange County. Many complain of human rights abuses by Saigon and contend that the Vietnamese government has failed to reveal all it knows about Americans missing since the Vietnam War.

There was noisy opposition in Little Saigon when President Clinton lifted the U.S. trade embargo against Vietnam in 1994, and again when diplomatic relations were restored in 1995.

Bilateral trade was worth more than $1 billion last year, making the United States one of Vietnam's top 10 investors, according to the Congressional Reporting Service.

Recently, the administration has been discussing changes to the Jackson-Vanik agreement, a Cold War-era law that restricts economic ties with communist countries that keep people from leaving. Clinton wants to take Vietnam off a list of six countries denied most favored nation status under that law.

Republican congressmen Dana Rohrabacher and Ed Royce have offered legislation to stop or delay normalizing trade ties. Rep. Loretta Sanchez, a Democrat, joined them in asking the White House to maintain the status quo. A Senate committee holds hearings this week on the issue.

Removing Vietnam from the restricted list would allow traders to work with the Overseas Private Investment Corp., the Export-Import Bank and other U.S. financial programs.

Businesses say they are at a disadvantage without those services because foreign rivals get help from

Jail food distributor allegedly gave police employee bribes

CORRUPTION: Department administrator accused of accepting money to negotiate financial contracts

The Associated Press

A Sheriff's Department administrator allegedly was bribed to provide millions of dollars in contracts for jail food, authorities said.

Fredrick Gaio, the No. 2 man in the department's $20 million food operation, was arrested on Friday following a 15-month internal investigation. Independent food contractor Rick Hodgin also was arrested for allegedly paying Gaio more than $9,000 in bribes over two years in order to receive millions in contracts, authorities said.

Gaio, 52, of Long Beach, was being held on $45,000 bail. Hodgin, 41, was free on $30,000 bail.

Gaio allegedly received lease payments for a car and a free trip to Las Vegas – complete with limousine and gambling money – to steer county business to Hodgin and his food-vendor clients.

Authorities said they suspect far more money may have changed hands.

"I'm sure there are a lot of things we will never prove, never find," Sgt. John A. Nemeth said. "It's a den of thieves, this food service business."

The arrests are the latest in a series of problems in the Los Angeles County Sheriff's Department, providing likely fodder for critics of Sheriff Sherman Block as he seeks reelection this year.

Last week, allegations arose that deputies provoked assaults on suspected child molesters, possibly leading to the death of one inmate. Jail officials also have been criticized for providing inadequate medical care and for keeping some inmates in custody too long.

And when they would ask what are you going to be when you grow up and without thinking, I would answer wait on people in a store just like this one and they would laugh at such a meager dream they hadn't travelled so much so the granddaughter would end up, like them behind the counter.
And they would send me off to study, because one who studies
even if she's a woman, succeeds.

plaint against her own department would help, Hassinger said she decided to hire a lawyer to assist in resolving her complaints.

However, her lawyer has had trouble resolving the complaints as well.

Only two members from Hassinger's original crew remain currently employed. Those that have been fired, however, cannot be interviewed by Human Resources because they are no longer employees for Business and Finance.

Three weeks ago, Hassinger and her lawyer were told that the investigation was complete.

However, Hassinger says she has yet to hear any word on the outcome. Hassinger and her lawyer are scheduled to meet with Human Resources and directors from the Housing Administration in the next two weeks to discuss the investigation. Campus Ombuds will serve as the mediator.

"We have a policy here, that you can't discriminate against sexual orientation. They broke their own policy, and that's what we're trying to get across here. They don't seem to want to accept that," Hassinger said.

"Everywhere you look, people are talking about the need to invest in our community colleges," Davis said. "From the president of the United States to the leaders of business industry to workers displaced by downsizing – everyone agrees that community colleges have never been more important, or frankly, more neglected."

their governments.

"If we had been able to put together funding more quickly, we would already be able to supply products to our Asian customers," said Rand Millar, president of Columbia Instruments in Laguna Niguel. "The amount of review required right now by banks and equity investors makes it all difficult."

Millar is trying to open a plant in the Binh Duong province, near Saigon, to make parts for industrial machinery.

Mark Sidel, who directed the Ford Foundation's programs in Vietnam from 1992 to 1995, said opposition to closer contact is weakening because Vietnam is starting to look less Stalinist.

"Certain voices in the community may be able to delay things for a short period of time because they are loud and persistent," said Sidel, who now teaches at the University of Iowa. "But in the longer term, there is no doubt we will move ahead with the Jackson-Vanik waiver."

– "to prepare ourselves," she joked, though she didn't believe the game would call her name.

After their arrival the group endured a four-hour wait, during which they had to answer various questions about themselves. Finally, the game began, and out of 400 members of the audience, Rosenberg was the fourth one called.

"The whole group was so excited," Rosenberg recalls with a smile.

Not that she wasn't excited herself; Rosenberg jumped up, screamed loudly and came running down.

Being called down does not guarantee anything, however. The next part of the game involves bidding against other contestants on an item, the point being to get as close as possible to the actual price without going over.

"Whenever I watched the show at home, I never got that part right. I was one of the first people called up and I thought, oh no, I'm going to be here bidding the whole time." After losing on two guesses – a pair of glass statuettes and a motor bike, Rosenberg bid $950 on a dresser – of which the actual price was $999.

With that, Rosenberg got on the stage and the game "Plinko." In this game a contestant starts off with one chip and uses that to guess the price on other prizes and win more chips. Rosenberg had to guess the prices for four prizes: a vacuum, a can of paint, a vanity mirror and a waffle maker.

She guessed the correct price on all these items and not only won all four prizes, but also increased her one chip to five chips. From here she went to a machine where the amount of money she would win was determined by which slot the chips fell into.

She got $5,000 on the first chip, zero on the next, $5,000 on the third, again zero, and then $500 on the last for a total of $10,500.

Rosenberg and the two other contestants who made it to the stage then went to the Wheel, which has a variety of numbers in the form of cents. Here contestants have two chances to spin the wheel and pray that it lands as close as possible to $1 without going over – Rosenberg spun $0.85 and advanced to the "Showcase Showdown."

With Rosenberg's arrival at the Showcase Showdown, the first half of the game was over and her next job was to wait for a nerve-wracking half-hour for the next three contestants.

At the Showcase Showdown, contestants are offered themed prizes. The contestant who has already won more money is presented the first theme and offered a chance to either bid on that showcase or pass and bid on the next.

Rosenberg, who was ahead in the game, was offered a showcase titled, "Home Improvement."

"The announcer describing the prizes was saying, 'A way to improve your den is with this new roll-top desk and portable fireplace!' and I was thinking how most people would rather win a vacation or a car or more money and I was trying to decide whether or not to pass on it."

"But then he added, 'And a way to improve your garage is with this new 1998 Mustang Convertible!'"

Needless to say, Rosenberg took the showcase.

"My family was in a car accident not too long ago and my mom has my car, so we've been saving up to get another car."

Rosenberg had to bid on the total package, again attempting to come as close as possible to the actual price without going over.

During a normal "Price is Right" game a rowdy audience attempts to help the contestant by shouting out their guesses; Rosenberg, however, relied solely on instinct.

"All my friends were in the back row and I'd forgotten my glasses, so I couldn't see them.

"Besides, when you're up there, you're just so nervous."

Her instincts – and the fact a friend had recently been looking for a Ford Mustang – told her to bid $18,500 for the car, desk and fireplace. The audiences' reaction?

"No one cheered." All she heard was a collective and disappointed "Oh" from the back.

"I thought I had way overbid because of that," she explained, then laughed.

"Actually, everyone thought I had way underbid." Either way, her spirits sank. When a worker came up to host Bob Barker and whispered something, Rosenberg was certain it was, "She went over."

"I told myself, I already won $10,500, I don't need to win the Showcase Showdown. But wouldn't it be so awesome if I did and everyone got to run downstage ..." she trailed off.

Then it was the other contestant's turn, and his showcase had a Lincoln Mercury. The contestant bid $20,000.

"I know Lincolns are really expensive and I knew he was under, but then my friends started cheering and I was just totally confused." Even if the contestant had underbid, if Rosenberg was even a dollar over she would have lost.

Then Barker announced the results: the other contestant's prize was worth $40,000, and so he was $20,000 off. The total price of Rosenberg's showcase was $23,000 – she was only $4,500 short, and with that $10,500 richer, not to mention the proud new owner of a roll-top desk, fireplace and 1998 Mustang Convertible.

Next came her friend's reactions. "Everyone came running down," Rosenberg laughs gleefully, recalling her floor's excitement.

Most of the prizes will be shipped to Rosenberg's home in Northern California where, she claims, her room is in dire need of remodeling.

"I have the same bedroom I had since I was four, and my mother's saying I have to get a new bedroom set."

The car, of course, will come to UCLA. And the money? "Taxes," Rosenberg admits. "They tax you about 33 percent on prizes and my total winnings were around $38,500, so I have to pay around $12,000."

"But," she adds brightly, "I now have the money I was saving for a new car, so I still feel I won."

Above all else, Rosenberg is happy she was able to share the experience with her floor.

"I might do something for them, during finals week or something. They were the ones who were with me."

Rosenberg shakes her head disbelievingly, still unable to believe her good fortune.

"This just doesn't happen," she says.

and Jackson. She discovered that she could use the women's gymnasium for her daily shower and sleep under the bridge at night, having made a bed of several planks, a pile of straw and blankets from the women's gymnasium."

Sumner herself recalls a surprising discovery made during a campus tour in the early 1940s.

"During the war, below where the bridge is, enough food was stored for 50,000 people if we were bombed," she said. "People were very frightened of a Japanese submarine attack."

After the end of the war, new building sites were required to accommodate the burgeoning expansion of UCLA's campus and curriculum.

According to Hamilton and Jackson, Provost Clarence A. Dykstra was one of those opposed to filling in the 300-foot long arroyo to provide the needed sites. He was in favor of implementing an underground parking lot.

"The day will arrive, and sooner than most of us realize," Dykstra had said, "when tens of thousands of cars will come to the campus and need such space in which to park."

Yet his prediction went unheeded, and tons of earth were scooped up from other areas of the campus, dumped and packed into the chaparral-covered arroyo.

However, the bridge was preserved by placing plywood sheets against the brick before covering it with dirt.

"There was no need to do anything but fill around it," said Duke Oakley, assistant vice chancellor of Capital Programs.

He appeared in an episode of the TV show "California Gold," focusing on the bridge. "Affection for the structure and economics were in harmony at this point and prevented the bridge from being torn down. It instead was encapsulated."

It still acts as a bridge. The columns and spans of the bridge support the roadway and the sidewalk.

Hence that little white sign at the Murphy intersection. However, a 1983 study concluded that the bridge was strong enough to support vehicles holding up to 10 tons, and heavier loads have rumbled across the bridge without incident.

"We're not exactly sure where the 10,000 pound rating came from," said John MacDougall, director of engineering for Capital Programs. "We're getting a structural engineer to check and see if it's better than thought, or what's needed to upgrade it.

"It's been left because it was the first campus structure; it has historical interest. And it's a lot of space to fill in. It's like Carlsbad Caverns under there."

The "space" to which MacDougall refers is the area directly under the bridge, sandwiched between the Romanesque arches. An underground stairwell cattycorner from Dodd Hall is now its main access point.

Marked off by brown guardrails, the dark stairwell leads to a door, behind which are the electrical conduit, pipes and emergency generators, now housed by the bridge. Sundry equipment taken out of buildings during remodeling have also been stored in the musty, humid space, should they one day be needed somewhere else.

Wooden steps lead down to a landing, which ends abruptly at a sharp drop down the ravine. Graffiti is scrawled on several of the columns and walls, some of it dated in the early 1940s. Pranksters have been known to light fireworks and dump toilets into the ravine.

> "It's been left because it was the first campus structure ... and it's a lot of space to fill in. It's like Carlsbad Caverns under there."

The same stream seen by Sumner still runs through an opening at the bottom of one of the arches though, causing soil erosion problems when heavy rains deluge the area, as has been the case for the past year.

Thus over a span of seventy years, the bridge has evolved from an affectionately regarded campus landmark to a little-known legacy.

As '43 alumnus Jim Klain had recounted on "California Gold," it was difficult to say, "Well, I'll meet you at the bridge," when other people would say, "What are you talking about? What bridge?" And then Klain laughed and remembered: "Oh, that's right, they filled that gully in."

Yet the bridge remains today, its guardrails serving as a reminder that it is, in fact, the most original structure on the UCLA campus.

would keep the present federal bar against most state-court medical malpractice lawsuits against managed care companies for decisions that result in injury or death.

Permitting such lawsuits is a controversial feature of a prominent managed care reform proposal sponsored by Rep. Charles Norwood, R-Ga., and Sen. Alfonse D'Amato, R-N.Y.

Norwood has gained over 200 cosponsors in the House, but the measure's support in the Senate is more tepid.

Groups such as the Health Insurance Association of America and the American Association of Health Plans have lobbied hard against it, arguing the proposal would raise premium costs and lead some employers to drop coverage.

Lieberman said the absence of such a contentious element would elevate his bill's political appeal.

"This is a proposal that could pass this year," he said. "It's great to have a big battle and take strong stands on either side, but in the end the question is what have we done to improve the quality of health care. Jim Jefford's proposal is the one that can pass."

Next week, congressional Democratic leaders including House Minority Leader Dick Gephardt of Missouri and Senate Minority Leader Tom Daschle of South Dakota will introduce their own managed care reform bill.

In addition to appeal rights, the Jeffords-Lieberman bill would establish a federal health care quality advisory board to advise the White House and Congress about managed care quality.

The bill would force managed care companies to give consumers sensitive information, such as how a plan decides whether treatment is "experimental" and thus can be denied, and fee arrangements between plans and doctors.

It also would require managed care companies to cover the cost of emergency room visits anywhere if patients reasonably believe that not going would jeopardize their life or health. This element is a reaction to horror stories of patients arriving at emergency rooms only to be told they must go to facilities that contract with their particular health care plan.

Jeffords insisted the cost of implementing the bill would be minimal. The information and appeals aspects would raise health care costs 88 cents per person over three years, he said.

Richard Coorsh, spokesman for the Health Insurance Association of America, said that estimate was overly optimistic.

"We continue to have serious concerns about efforts to federalize quality standards because invariably they end up penalizing consumers," Coorsh said. "Consumers would have to bear the burden of higher costs."

Don White, spokesman for the American Association of Health Plans, said the organization representing 1,000 managed care groups would not comment until analysts had a chance to go over the bill.

It won praise from Consumers Union and the American College of Physicians, which represents 100,000 internal medicine specialists. Both groups are lobbying for greater regulation of managed care.

New grants for computers

Thumbs up to the state board of education for giving the Lennox School District an $872,744 grant to create a professional development center for teaching staff, parents and students about computers and to buy computers for every classroom.

All classrooms in the district have been wired for Internet access and have integrated the information superhighway into the curriculum.

The grant will allow the district to add more computers, which will allow greater access to the students. Students use the computers for math, reading and social studies.

The development center will train teachers to further integrate the technology into classrooms and the curriculum.

The grant will help teachers to continue applying technology to education, and students can benefit greatly. The information superhighway is yet another avenue for students to learn.

Removing ads to clean up city

Thumbs up to students in Covina for taking the initiative to better their community. They made a presentation before the city council and asked to remove all cigarette billboards from the city.

After hearing pleas from local students about the dangers of cigarette advertising, members of the city council asked its planning commission to review Covina's ordinance on billboards.

Eight students from Sierra Vista Intermediate School made a presentation to council Feb. 17 regarding four billboards that advertise tobacco products within the city.

The students want to follow Compton's example and ban tobacco ads on billboards.

"I was very impressed with the presentation," said Mayor Thomas O'Leary. "Each student tackled an issue related to the ban, such as the First Amendment issues."

For the love of MONEY

SOCIETY: Those green bills are the motivating force behind everything from getting married to admissions

Forget love. Money makes the world go round. Call me a cynic, but I prefer to think of myself as a realist. From the time toddlers are able to walk and comprehend the allure of a gumball machine in a supermarket, money is the end-all be-all solution to any problem. I can safely say that, in the end, absolutely everything comes down to money. All of our actions, no matter how considerate or altruistic, will be motivated by little green slips of paper. Money talks and cow flop gets exported to Ohio, where a bunch of good ol' boys see who can throw it farthest in statewide competitions.

Alex Balekian

After all of the ephemeral aspects of our actions are stripped away, the underlying reason behind them has historically been money. From the thousands of examples that I can think of, here are but a few.

Modern medicine has a great debt to pay to old tobacco. In virology, for example, the most well-known and thoroughly studied virus is the one that causes tobacco mosaic disease. By studying the microbe which can devastate prized crops, scientists working for cigarette companies elucidated the structure and mechanisms of a virus long before any of us knew what a protein capsid even was. In addition, most of what we study in neurophysiology is based on the junction between two neurons. Whereas other neurotransmitter receptors are relatively obscure, scientists have exhaustively studied nicotinic receptors, leaving no stone unturned. Much of what I learn in my biology classes is a direct result of Phillip Morris Inc. protecting its bottom line and developing a more resilient and addictive tobacco plant.

Gay rights essentially boils down to money as well. Several months ago, we had heated protests in front of Covel Commons, where the latest UC Board of Regents meeting was taking place. Gay activists were campaigning for the approval of domestic partner benefits for gay and lesbian couples.

Ideally, granting partners benefits would bestow a sense of equality to the gay community, but equality isn't exactly what they were after. "Benefits" is a far-reaching word. If a gay couple is considered married in the eyes of the law, the monetary ramifications would be remarkable. Married couples are taxed substantially less than two people who would normally file separately. In addition, having dependent children would qualify the couple for further tax credits; doesn't everyone remember the hubbub over gay couples being able to adopt children? Finally, a gay man would not have to pay for medical coverage if his partner, who works for the UC system, has a policy which incorporates both of them. Equality may be a welcome coincidence, but money is the coveted prize.

Heterosexual couples aren't exempt from the cash concept either. Marriages, in general, are business arrangements. Love may initially play a role in bringing two strangers together, but money keeps them bound. As mentioned before, taxes are substantially less when couples file together.

When couples reach their silver or golden anniversaries, they don't love each other anymore; they simply tolerate each other. They stick with each other because the getting is good. What can I do for you, and what can you do for me? When one partner cannot uphold his or her end of the bargain, the marriage degenerates and divorce follows soon after. Usually, the breadwinner doesn't bring home enough bread, and the cash concept goes into action.

> As I mentioned before, money talks and fertilizer walks.

Religion is another important part of life which falls prey to money. Something so sanctified as organized religion surely would be kept apart from the immoral world of finances. How many places of worship don't have the practice of passing around the collection plate? The vileness of money conveniently disappears when they are in need of it. My uncle once joked about the practice of Orthodox churches closing a curtain around the altar during mass just as the collection plates finished their tour of the pews; he claimed that the men were counting the change inside while continuing with their chanting. It may seem far-fetched, but I have yet been able to disprove it.

The Church of Scientology, or Scientology, as its critics like to write, is a prime example of the growing involvement of money with religion. Not only does L. Ron Hubbard have a legacy of millions of books sold and hundreds of celebrities brainwashed, his minions have managed to make his church a recognized religion. So what if this crackpot's mode of worship has been recognized, you ask? Being a federally recognized religion entails that the Church of Scientology is tax-exempt; it does not have to declare its earnings to the IRS or worry about paying any taxes on it. Does this sort of privilege open possible doors of corruption and fraud for the Church of Scientology and other organized religions? Absolutely.

Other types of organizations have been spawned from monetary fraud. The Branch Davidians, the Freemen and other separatist groups are essentially wanted criminals. These people claim to be upholding their rights as citizens against the encroachment of the government. I had no idea that committing check fraud with several different banks was a guaranteed protected right under the constitution. Whether they be the Freemen charged with check fraud and tax evasion, or the Branch Davidians charged with illegal weapons possession, today's freedom fighters are only one step away from the likes of Charles Keating.

Politics is also a prime example of my point. Anything that ever gets done in Congress is a result of logrolling and pork barreling. For example, the construction of NASA would not have been realized had it not been strategically placed in Texas. Everyone is familiar with the famous phrase, "Houston, we have a problem," but no one fully comprehends why NASA headquarters are located in Houston. When President John F. Kennedy died, he left behind the legacy of an unfinished space program. In order to complete the project, Congress needed the support of President Lyndon B. Johnson, who,

Posting your resume on the Internet

EMPLOYMENT: The web can help you find a job if you put in some effort

By Brian Krueger
University Wire

Internet resumes are a different breed from the "typical" paper resume. Most paper resumes are verb oriented. But Internet resumes need to accomplish a different purpose, since they function best in searchable format. And employers don't search for verbs, they search for nouns. Nouns are the keywords, or "buzzwords," that employers look for in prequalifying potential candidates.

In preparing your resume for posting on the Internet, be sure to first examine your resume from the perspective of searchability. Even if the resume is not initially keyword searched, it may find its way into an employer or general resume database beyond its initial posting location. In constructing your Internet resume, consider the view from the other side of the desk and what you would typically look for in searching for a candidate such as yourself. If the proper keywords are not already included, revamp your resume to a specialized format that includes a separate "keyword" section.

If you initially formatted your resume with a word processor, make sure you save it in text (ASCII) format. Then double-check all formatting (especially if you used columns) to insure a clean look upon printing. Your resume is then ready for posting.

The default standard for posting your resume is ASCII text format, which generally allows for greater searchability. However, with the greater usage of the Web, HTML (hypertext markup language) format is also growing in acceptance. The benefit of HTML is the flexibility with regard to graphics and overall presentation format. You can create a web site all your own, complete with your fully formatted resume. And many e-mail packages (such as Netscape Mail) are now HTML-enabled, allowing for full formatting within the body of the message. To quickly generate your own HTML resume, go the Resumix site at http://www.resumix.com, where you will have use a fill-in-the- blanks form to help you in constructing.

In order to understand Internet postings, it is important to note that there is more to posting your resume than just placing it on a Usenet Newsgroup, then sitting back waiting for the phone calls (or e-mails) inviting you to the interview. Although most "passive postings" such as this take little time to initially generate, they are also less likely to produce positive results. The best results are achieved through both passive and active posting.

Passive posting includes posting to all of the "usual" sites, such as (in order of importance) the misc.jobs.resumes Usenet Newsgroup, Online Career Center (http://www.occ.com), E-Span (http://www.espan.com), and Monster Board (http://www.monster.com). Make sure that you post directly from the e-mail address you are most active with, since many employers will respond directly to that address. The key with any such passive postings is the use of an informative subject line. You will need to state clearly and succinctly your objective in 80 characters or less. Forget your English grammar class and simply force as many keywords into the subject line as possible. And unless you want to almost guarantee your resume won't be read, don't put the words "entry level" in the subject line. Very few employers are searching the Internet looking specifically for entry level.

Active posting involves surfing individual employer postings or job postings and responding directly with an e-mail resume. This is actually a much more productive method, since it is more direct and personal. It also provides you with the opportunity to add additional comments that relate to a specific employer. And you also have a contact point for later follow-up.

When posting your resume passively, you truly have no idea who has viewed your resume, when, where, how or why. You are literally waiting for them to contact you. For all you know, your resume was never viewed by anyone, or if it was, it may have been printed, reviewed, entered into a database and searched consistently, while still producing no direct contact. All you know is that it has generated no interviews. There is nearly absolute lack of control.

> Don't expect that ... sending an e-mail will generate a job offer.

But by posting your resume actively, you always have a point of reference. Since you were the one who made the initial match of your background to the employer and its requirements, it's up to you to take the contact to the next level. Because of your initial contact, you will always have an avenue to follow and a reference point to return to. Don't expect that merely sending an e-mail will generate a job offer. Or an interview. As with any employer contact, it will typically require multiple contacts before you get past square one.

Resume posting on the Internet is ideally suited for those who are seeking more technical professions, such as computers or engineering. But remember that the supply side in these areas is also very crowded with experienced candidates. So if your background is non-technical, you will actually be more of a standout on the Internet. And don't ever be shy about publicly proclaiming your availability. Discretion will come later in your career. For now, the more people who are aware of your availability, the better.

IRAQ: U.S. carefully weighs options before acting in foreign nations

By Wesley Jay Morris

I am writing in response to Garrick Ruiz's article on the hypocrisy in the Iraqi Crisis ("Military action downright hypocritical," Feb. 26). Ruiz attempts to note the great hypocrisy of the situation and he closely examines the five reasons the Clinton administration gives for justifying the use of force in the situation. I think Ruiz misconstrues some of his arguments and misses the true reason the United States is so concerned with Iraq.

Ruiz first claims that the United States is not really that dependent on natural resources from the Middle East. This might be true; the United States might be able to live without this source of oil. However, Ruiz quickly evades the original point of "strategic value" and quickly remarks about the political institutions of the individual states in the Gulf Region. Not to mention that "strategic value" does not necessarily include Iraq, but the stability of the entire region. If Iraq attacks one of its neighbors, that upsets the balance of power in the region and everyone is going to start shooting first and asking questions later. That is a serious "strategic" problem.

Ruiz begins his second point of inquiry on the proliferation of "non-conventional arms." Ruiz is quick to point out that the United States is being hypocritical by denouncing Iraq's development of "non-conventional arms" while the United States has the largest supply of these weapons themselves. Stopping the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction has absolutely nothing to do with our number of weapons. It is the goal of the United States to limit other countries from obtaining these weapons of mass destruction for the sole reason of protecting our own interests. One of those interests is insuring that a terrorist does not buy nuclear weapons from Iraq, smuggle the weapon into the United States, and then cook off a nuke in downtown Los Angeles.

Ruiz then strays from the original point of non-conven-

by sheer coincidence, happened to be from Texas. Had Kennedy not died, the flight crew on Apollo 13 would have probably said "Boston, we have a problem."

Recently, when President Clinton came to rain-soaked Southern California to declare several counties in need of federal emergency aid, local residents cheered him. Were they happy that the president deemed them special enough to be considered in an emergency situation? They were instead happy about all of the money which will be pouring out. Families will receive thousands of dollars for declaring a crack in the wall, which can be remedied with a $40 container of putty. Where there is a large purse, a fleecing is sure to follow.

Finally, the best example of the cash concept is present on our campus. Ask the thousands of students of South Campus why they are pre-med students. Helping people and finding a cure for a ravaging disease will top the list as reasons why these idealistic students chose their path of study. What we will never hear, but always understand, is that doctors make a phenomenally large amount of money every year. Even with the looming policies of HMOs, physicians can still make money hand over fist. Students wishing to get into professional schools will be completely idealistic for the duration of their interview in front of the admissions board. Ask these students several years later if they remember their idealism as they are pulling into a handicapped spot in their brand new Beamer.

Getting into professional schools isn't all that idealistic either. As I mentioned before, money talks and fertilizer walks. No matter how perfect a student's GPA or test scores are, there will always be a rich applicant whose father will undermine the application process by donating a new wing to the university hospital. This act of accepting a less-than-qualified applicant for his financial clout produces results. After all, where would our university be without all of the private research grants that it receives? Don't we know in our heart of hearts that the university must somehow be greasing the wheels of this huge juggernaut to keep it and the cash flow rolling?

All of these examples may have been hard to swallow, but we need to take the fleas with the dog. Try as we may, money will always play an important, albeit unseen, role in our daily actions. We can only hope to make as much as we can and exploit the system to our benefit.

tional proliferation to talk about conventional land mines and eventually back to ideology. Proliferation generally refers to the spread of weapons of mass destruction. Nations around the world need conventional weapons to protect themselves from invasion and to settle low-conflict disputes (the point being not to annihilate). This cannot be disputed. It is not the United States' goal to outlaw all weapons. Ruiz also claims that the United States does not seem too concerned about other countries obtaining these weapons. I believe they are more than concerned about other cases of weapons of mass destruction falling into the hands of unstable governments and radically anti-American dictators. Proliferation of non-conventional weapons by these people would once again be against our best interests.

Ruiz does bring up some good questions during his examination of the "containment of aggression." Yes, the United States does have a long track record of acting aggressively in other nations. This cannot be disputed. However, what caused the United States to act in the first place? If we allow Iraq to invade and capture neighboring countries, we will have another Hitler on our hands. In reality, we already have another Hitler. How do you explain the illogical actions that Hussein has performed since becoming the president of Iraq? Gassing the Kurds, creating an ecological disaster area of the Persian Gulf, committing his country to a war that cannot be won, lying about winning the war to his people – the list goes on and on. There is no explanation. Hussein has mental problems and they are going to continue unless he gets medical help (doubtful) or he is removed from power.

Everyone in the world is concerned with his or her own interests.

Ruiz then points his attention to the United Nations and the United States as a world superpower. I happen to agree with Ruiz's critical attitude towards the United Nations. The United Nations is a complete farce. There is probably no other political organization in this world that is more corrupt than the United Nations. And it is true that the United States picks and chooses when to listen to the United Nations. We mined the harbors of Nicaragua in direct violation of U.N. orders. Yet, six years later the United Nations gives the United States permission to take action in Panama. The United Nations has been ineffective in its peacekeeping efforts and attempts to use the guise of "world peace" to involve itself in the affairs of sovereign nations. Unfortunately the United States has taken upon itself the role of the world policeman and involved itself in the trivial matters of other nations. The United States' acceptance of the U.N. Charter was an unfortunate step in surrendering some of our own sovereignty.

I believe it is vital that the United States carefully weigh its interests before becoming involved in any foreign crisis, no matter what the issue is or who it involves. You may ask how I can say such a horrible thing? Well I will tell you.

Everyone in this world is concerned with his or her own interests. Sure, there are people who are really concerned about the interests of the people of East Timor or the "oppressed people" of whatever nation happens to be the latest spot in the news or in the Daily Bruin for the day. Be honest, how many of you would care about East Timor if your immediate survival were at stake? How many "oppressed people" halfway across the globe do you think would care if Canada suddenly invaded the United States and killed 150 million Americans with weapons of mass destruction? This world is in a state of political anarchy. It is every nation for itself. If the situation has no effect on your immediate survival or your interests for continuing your present way of life, it is simply not going to be a high priority. The United States has the means to act and our leaders are going to act and will continue to act when they think that our interests are threatened. All the yelling and screaming in the world will not change that.

Body art provides thought for minds

LACMA: New exhibit has interesting perspectives on human appearances

By Vanessa VanderZanden
Daily Bruin Staff

It contains us. It moves us. It frees us and controls us.

But what really is this mortal coil?

That is the question with which the current exhibit at the Los Angeles County Museum of Art (LACMA) attempts to grapple. Titled "From Head to Toe: Concepts of the Body in Twentieth-Century Art," the permanent collection pieces used illustrate a changing view of the human form. Showing through April 27, the show reflects the attitudes of nearly 45 different artists.

Many images draw on a variety of mediums to depict their subject. For example, Annette Messager relies on not only two human-sized black and white photographs of feet in her piece, but she continues her statement with the inclusion of several chopped up pictures and colored ink. The ink drips down the feet like watercolor and swirls around the collage-style clippings.

While the left foot has pieces of a face turning like a vortex from the heel, the right foot has a calm depiction of a harbor scene displayed on it. Jarring images of creatures and scissors and a key mysteriously creep at the left foot's sole, leaving one to question if the work doesn't play with the idea of a foot's sole as a metaphor for the "internal" soul. In this way, Messager seems to suggest that people have two souls, one confused and one eternally serene.

Likewise, Matta's untitled 1940 piece uses several materials to reveal a less-than-stable concept of the human form. Crayon, pencil and collage reveal practically cartoon-like sketches of people with bluish, yellowish or pinkish skin. Set upon a multi-dimensional background, the work seems at once straightforward and shifty.

> If art didn't provoke audiences to exercise their intellectual capacities, museums might as well not exist.

The characters merge into each other during several contrasting acts. In one portion, two figures lose themselves in the midst of love-making, while in another, three forms slip into one another during a knife fight. Meanwhile, two more bodies appear to have been just slain, still lingering at the edge of one contorted figure's swift foot.

However, the only character truly alone seems engaged in performing hari-kari upon a private mat. Yet, the other two victims suggest that not even in death comes peace, only the interchange of connection with other individuals. In a sense, Matta reveals how the human form creates the capacity for deeper human connection, as strange and chaotic as it may often be.

Another multi-textural piece exists in Tim Hawkinson's "Blindspot (Fat Head)." As the artist blends together acrylic, hide glue, resin, wax on paper and steel, he forms his interpretation of what the parts of his body look like which are not visible within his view. Acne, warts and the opening to an anus all reveal themselves as though on the skinned hide of a slaughtered man.

With the words "Fat Head" barely visible in red and green over the entirety of the work, it remains unclear if Hawkinson pokes fun at his visible shortcomings or whether he finds his "blindspot" helpful. In any case, the unusual perspective calls to attention the normative angles in which one perceives oneself. It also brings to mind the film "The Silence of the Lambs."

Similarly, Vito Acconci has fun with the body in his "Prototype for Virtual Pleasure Mask." Here, a fencer's wire-netted face helmet has a huge pink penis for a nose and an open pink

'Backstreet' breaks musical traditions

THEATER: Production proves size, spectacle not necessary for good drama

By Cheryl Klein
Daily Bruin Senior Staff

First, kudos to the Santa Monica Playhouse for accepting the challenge of staging an original musical production in a venue that is tiny at best. Audiences tend to associate musical theater with Andrew Lloyd Webber-style grandiosity – booming orchestras, falling chandeliers and spectacular light shows put the theatrics in theater.

Limited budgets push smaller theaters in the direction of intimate, dialogue-based straight plays more often than not. So if for no other reason than sheer determination, the Playhouse's production of "Backstreet," a world-premiere, nearly sung-through period musical, stands out.

The dusky lights go up on a turn-of-the-century Jewish brothel as lavishly costumed women appear one by one for "Ladies of the Backstreet/Good Evening." The grabbing opening number introduces us to Rivkele (Morgan Kibby), the teen-aged daughter of a bordello owner known only as Uncle (John Waroff). She stares stoically from an upstairs window, lamenting the life of purity her father is determined she lead, as a silhouetted lady of the evening powders herself behind a pink curtain below.

The number and those that follow quickly alleviate any doubt as to whether the small playhouse, itself an alcove on the Promenade's backstreet, can pull together a full-fledged musical. Sadly, though, "Backstreet" falls short when it comes to what small theater is supposedly best at – depth and nuance.

Santa Monica Playhouse

Uncle (John Waroff, right) has some choice words for Shloyme (Chris DeCarlo) in the musical production "Backstreet."

The storyline is relatively predictable, though there is nothing to say that an old story can't be told again, provided it's done well. And in this case, that is debatable.

As Uncle tries, ironically, to sell his daughter into respectability by waving her dowry in front of local young men, Rivkele falls for Eli (Matt Wrather), fresh off the boat from Russia and the nephew of aging prostitute Hindl. After an annoyingly typical hate-at-first-sight introduction, it's clear they'll end up together, though not without a lot of confusion and tough decisions. Meanwhile, Hindl (Evelyn Rudie) aches to leave Uncle's stern supervision and open a house of her own with her lover, Shloyme (Chris DeCarlo).

It's been said that comedies end in weddings, tragedies in funerals. "Backstreet" is on the verge of being a comedy as the two couples tie the knot and break the glass at an impromptu wedding toward the close of the show. But in a rather random effort to declare itself a "serious" musical, the show takes a violent turn in the last minutes.

This prompts Hindl to gushingly blurt the secret she's alluded to throughout. Yet the revelation is merely an anticlimactic culmination of a plot device that wasn't terribly suspenseful to start with. If Shloyme didn't have a problem marrying a prostitute, what makes her (or us) think that he wouldn't be understanding regarding other matters?

Backstage on BROADWAY

Between them, they have worked with Jimi Hendrix, Janis Joplin, Depeche Mode and Soul Asylum. They have made films starring Jane Fonda, Bill Clinton and most recently Carol Burnett. But you probably don't know much about D.A. Pennebaker and Chris Hegedus because they are involved in an often overlooked genre of filmmaking: documentaries.

Sitting in the conference room of the Courtyard Marriott, Pennebaker dressed modestly in a wool sport coat and Hegedus in a simple beige pantsuit, the husband-and-wife filmmaking team say that they don't do make documentaries for the fame or money. They do it for the thrill of capturing the essence of human drama.

"I think that documentary film is a way at getting at whatever that is – the knowledge – that the fiction can never get at by its very nature," Pennebaker says.

Later he adds, "What interests us is that when actors go into a movie, which has a script, the responsibility for both the director and the actor is to the script. When we film people, of course, we don't have any scripts. We never begin with a script, we don't know how to write scripts, we couldn't read them if we could write them – it's just not what we know how to do."

Pennebaker and Hegedus's most recent film is "Moon Over Broadway," a documentary following Carol Burnett's return to Broadway in the play "Moon Over Buffalo" after 30 years of television. Not only have they done critically acclaimed documentaries such as the 1993 Academy Award nominated "The War Room" about the Bill Clinton's 1992 presidential campaign, they have also ventured into directing rock videos for performers, such as Suzanne Vega and Soul Asylum. However, documentaries are their first love.

"(Directing rock videos) is fun to do, if you like the band," Pennebaker comments. "It's frustrating if it's going to be done to playback (lip-syncing), for me anyway. You're not making use of what the performer does best, which is perform. They're a limited kind of fulfillment for us."

Techno-blues group A3 revival makes everyone into believers

CONCERT: Band members preach 'Elvis religion' as performance rocks crowd

By Mike Prevatt
Daily Bruin Senior Staff

Despite the unfortunate closing of the electronica club Frequency at the Hollywood Athletic Club on Friday night, country-techno-gospel-acid-house-blues band A3 threw a 75-minute revival that was anything but sad and reflective.

A3, better known in their native England as Alabama 3, converted the initially still and only slightly interested club-goers into believers Friday night as they revealed their plan to save the world: A 12-step plan with the word of the King ... Elvis himself.

Yep. A3, comprised of 11 or so band members, are led by two charismatic singers with a schtick that is indeed the oddest in pop music today: The Very Reverend Dr. D Wayne Love and lead vocalist Larry Love. Through the Reverend's evangelistic-style preachings and Love's Leonard Cohen-like vocal deliveries, it's blues in the church house with A3, who take country gospel blues and layer it with acid house and techno beats. This infectious and curious sound serves as the musical background for the preaching of A3's "religion," which prays to The First Presleytarian Church of Elvis the Divine (U.K.), worshipping the King himself.

But behind the silliness and the exaggerated performances of the Reverend, whose vocal musings and crude oratories on the church was often lost upon onlookers not familiar with A3, never took away from Love's ultracool vocals and onstage presence, or the hypnotic music which boomed throughout the Hollywood Athletic Club in a laid-back but un-ignorable way.

A3 came on stage after 11 p.m. to a crowd roaming from dance floor to dance floor, looking for the right techno rhythms and electronic-based pop hooks to groove to. As Larry Love and the Reverend appeared, people in the front reached out to touch them á la Jimmy Swaggert style. Unfortunately, the preachings came out muffled through the speaker system, losing a few of the audience members just on-hand to dance. The Reverend proved he was no ordinary man of the church, standing over the edge of the stage and shoving his hand down his pants while holding a beer in the other.

The Reverend's verbosity ranged from crowd-rousing ("Acid House is in the house!") and humorous to self-congratulatory and presumptuous, as he hinted that his style of country blues would be delivered the same way by Hank Williams had Williams lived to see 1998. Well, he could be right.

> A3 is still a top performance band, hailed in the U.K. as one of the best live bands.

The Reverend didn't go out of his way to act or talk like a rock star, except when he introduced the foot-stomping "Ain't Goin' To Goa" as "a worldwide fuckin' smash!" His character was more out of a cheesy movie, making A3's whole aura more fun than the usual concert fare.

Several tracks off of A3's debut release, "Exile on Coldharbour Lane," were featured, including the very danceworthy "Goa," the bluesy "Woke Up This Morning" and the honky-tonk majesty of "U Don't Dans To Tekno Anymore."

But not all of A3's pseudo gospel-hour performance was all camp. Strip away the '12-step plan' and A3 is still a top performance band, hailed in the U.K. as one of the best live bands around. Lead vocalist Larry Love displayed an earnestness in his singing that served as a nice opposite to the Reverend's ostentatious vocal delivery, highlighted especially in his aching yet near-perfect delivery of "Speed of the Sound of Loneliness," one of the more emotional tracks off "Exile."

Halfway into the show, the seemingly disinterested crowd began to stomp their feet and wave their hands in the air, especially with the socialism-driven "Bourgeoisie Blues" and the kinetic "Hypo Full of Love," performed with intra-band wrestling. Oddly enough, by the time the band played "Converted," the audience had full-on succumbed, practicing their faith with dancing and shouting.

For the encore, A3 busted out a rousing version of "Peace in the Valley," featured on the "A Life Less Ordinary" soundtrack. It might not have been a fitting end to Frequency and its reign as the coolest techno club in the land, but its gospel-like textures had the crowd clapping and stomping their way to the doors.

Call them satirical or wannabe white trash or even just kitschy, but the A3 electronic hoedown convinced Hollywood the honky tonk blues can be just as hip as any looped electronica show. Amen.

Miguel show draws emotions from all

MUSIC: Singer's romantic love songs mesmerize young, old audience alike

By Gregory Mena
Daily Bruin Senior Staff

First things first. The crowd was like an army of nervous dinner dates, clad in black formal wear. Some middle-aged couples and some fan club type teenagers showed up too.

But whoever it was, essentially they all had at least one reason in common for to seeing Luis Miguel perform on Thursday at the Pond: his voice.

Miguel's stop at the Pond was one in a string of shows, promoting his latest album, "Romances," which completes his trilogy of love song albums. It all started with the original collection of reworked boleros with "Romance" in 1992 and followed by "Segundo Romance" in 1994.

This year, Luis Miguel won the Grammy for Best Latin Pop Performance with "Romances." He beat out Cristian, Alejandro Fernandez, Julio Iglesias and Enrique Iglesias. Miguel never even showed up to accept the award.

Thursday he did show up, although he was a little late. When he came on stage, he slid, as if on ice, down a little ramp. He wore a grey, Wall Street-type suit a little too snug at the ribs. The women screamed.

The first couple of songs were mesmerizing. The audience was caught up in the signature Luis Miguel behavior. First it's the hair tugging. At regular intervals he toyed with his wavy hair using his fingers as a comb. Second, if you have seen him, you'll know that he lacks a natural dancing rhythm. For some reason, he continues to do that flying knee, karate-type move. People screamed at that too.

> Miguel was apparently overcome with emotion and then, becoming conscious of his tears, he smiled.

In between lyrics, he makes a hissing noise, presumably with the gap between his front teeth, which is, of course, another Miguel trademark.

The crowd's fixation continued into the second part of the show, when white-suited violinists sat in a huge half circle and Miguel slowed down things a bit.

Among others, he sang "No sé tú" and an emotional version of "La Incondicional," the first peak of the show.

A Spanish guitarist appeared midshow. Miguel, like any singer of baladas, would not omit a version of "Sabor A Mí," included on his latest CD. Although he didn't sing his heart out for it, Miguel caused a chain reaction throughout the crowd. Lovers whispered things into each others' ears. One in the crowd could hear things like, "Oh my God, he is so rad" or "Did he just take his tie off?"

Following the guitarist's set, a white-suited mariachi crew filed on stage. (Were those the same dudes from earlier but with sombreros?)

Instead of the anticipated "Si nos dejan," Miguel disappointed fans and chose to sing an obscure song.

Fortunately, he returned to more love songs for the best part of the concert. He sang most of the his recent exitos, or hits, using all of his voice. He performed "La Media Vuelta" and "Besáme Mucho."

But wait a minute. Were those real tears we saw at the end of "Por Debajo De La Mesa"? No feigned emotion here. Miguel was apparently overcome with emotion and then, becoming conscious of his tears, he smiled.

Again, the women screamed.

As a finale, the show ended with a mass balloon drop on the people with the good seats. He hopped around on stage and half-heartedly sang two upbeat disco numbers. He collected some flowers, maybe a letter or two and then left.

Before joining with Hegedus in 1976, Pennebaker worked on a number of films about musicians, including "Monterey Pop," which documented the festival that launched the careers of Jimi Hendrix and Janis Joplin, and he has always been fascinated with musicians.

For their latest project, Pennebaker and Hegedus chose to enter the enigmatic world of the backstage of Broadway, which was met with great resistance largely because of the high price of gaining "behind-the-scenes" access, and it was money that they didn't have. Hegedus explained that most attempts at shooting the Broadway backstage usually result in "some massive TV special."

They eventually gained access with the help of the production company for the theater, 101 Productions, who wanted to see a film made about Broadway. Even once they entered this world, they realized that they were still not going to be met with much cooperation.

"It was very restrictive," Pennebaker admits. "We weren't allowed to turn on any lights or have them bring in any extra lights, we couldn't plug into a socket, so it was a difficult situation to film in."

They found the restrictions relatively easy to conform to because of their already unobtrusive style of filmmaking. In the early '60s, Pennebaker and his former colleagues helped establish and define "direct cinema," a style which revolutionized documentary filmmaking that rejected the practice of voice-over narration in favor of recording real people and events as they happened, with as little "direction" from the filmmaker as possible.

This style is still the trademark of Pennebaker and Hegedus. Often it was simply the two of them on the film crew, Hegedus using a tape recorder that "looks like a small pocketbook" and Pennebaker using a camera "like the kind you take to a picnic." They knew their sacrifices would pay off in a film that promised much drama and emotion.

"Here's a woman coming in," Pennebaker says. "She hasn't been on Broadway for 30 years, and she's coming in from television. She's the 'queen of television, and she's coming in to this tight group of people who all say, 'Television?' So she's going to take them on, and she's kind of the wild creature, and they're the group that's mastered their art and they're very jealous of that art. And so you think, 'God, there's got to be drama there.'"

Hegedus adds, "It's usually more easy to make a story that follows one or two people, but we realized that it wasn't going to be just Carol Burnett and (her co-star) Philip Bosco, or Carol and the director (Tom Moore). The story was going to revolve around the writer (Ken Ludwig), it was going to revolve around these producers, and you had to go through all these threads to get to what was going on in this place."

BROADWAY

The product of their five months of filming offers a revealing look at, not only Broadway, but also Carol Burnett. Pennebaker and Hegedus were extremely interested in making a film about the life of a public figure away from the television camera and stage.

"I think that's why we like to do our films about (celebrities). A lot of the times, we just see them in their public role," Hegedus explains. "What we're really doing is giving everybody a peek behind the curtain at what these people are like. Everybody knows Carol because she's a television legend, but very few people get to see how Carol reacts when people ask her to act a different way, or how she is in her dressing room ..."

"How she is when she's nervous," Pennebaker continues for her. "You're so used to Carol Burnett completely on top of everything. But to see when she's nervous because she's not sure that she's going to remember the exact way a line goes. In Broadway, in a play, if the line is a certain way, that is the way you deliver it. If you don't, everybody's very upset. And that's the thing she wasn't used to."

The filmmaking duo believe that this film is a testament to Burnett's professionalism and determination, something that the mainstream audience may not know about the comedic actress.

"During this whole process, because the play had not been written for a female star, the play had to be constantly rewritten throughout the rehearsal process, so every day she was given a stack of changes in the play. She dealt with it as a total professional. It was incredible to be around her, whereas the frustration and anxiety that you could see on her face was very high."

"Moon Over Broadway's" revealing look at the many complex relationships behind the scenes in the making of the play proved rather overwhelming for the cast and crew who viewed it after its completion.

"Ludwig found it very difficult to have a film where (it was) exposed that the producers were going to bring in a jokewriter to correct the show," Hegedus admits. "They never did bring in a jokewriter, but just that doubt and (to) have that open to the world is just very hard for him. And same thing for Carol. I don't think she realized that they were questioning her ability to perform the play in the way that it was written, before she saw the film.

Hegedus adds, "All of them just said that this is what they felt it was like to do a Broadway play, and it was very accurate, and even though it exposed a lot of anxieties over the process, that this was what it was about."

Despite the small budgets and limited distributions, Pennebaker and Hegedus hope that the appeal of Carol Burnett and "Moon Over Broadway" will help bring documentary films more into the mainstream consciousness. They strongly believe that this genre allows the excitement of realism that fictional films may lack.

They discussed this in the contrast between "The War Room" and "Primary Colors," an upcoming fictional film starring John Travolta about a sex scandal-riddled presidential campaign.

"I'm still really enamored with the drama and intensity that you find in a real-life story," Hegedus says. "There's nothing as exciting as watching the real people electing the real president. And as exciting as 'Primary Colors' is going to be, I think they were all very excited when (the actors) saw who the real people were in 'The War Room' because I know they all rented it and watched it, the people they were all going to impersonate."

But in the midst of a been-there-done-that storyline (think "Gigi") and syrupy lessons (find a surrogate family and then stand by them to the tearful end), a few solid performances and many dazzling examples of musical beauty emerge.

Rudie and DeCarlo have obvious chemistry as the middle-aged couple, their take-charge attitudes and resilient humor creating a wizened sort of love. Rudie's throaty, emotional belt also makes her the strongest vocally, though Sheila Yates' more traditional clear soprano provides competition within the brothel.

But it is eighth-grader Kibby who frequently surprises the audience with her maturity and range. She makes potentially trite lines believable and spars convincingly with her father, the appropriately stubborn and downtrodden Waroff. Thankfully, these performances balance out the interchangeably bland ensemble of prostitutes and Wrather's overly innocent Eli.

As a musician, however, Wrather redeems himself. He and Rudie have composed 18 immediately catchy, often powerful songs. The stand-out number is Hindl's second-act reflection on her reliance on clients' reassurances, "Reflections in Men's Eyes." Sung in the third person, the sad tale of dependence is reminiscent of "Chess." "Someone Else's Story," easily one of musical theater's most moving accomplishments. "Backstreet's" lyrics are often overwhelmingly poetic, conjuring images of rain-soaked cobblestone and forced smiles encased in pink lace.

"Achel Pachel," the number which closes the first act, also stands out, but only for its almost embarrassing departure from an otherwise CD-worthy score. Though the entire show is smattered with Yiddish and a few other numbers contain echoes of Klezmer, "Achel Pachel" launches into unadulterated stereotype in a bid for humor as the characters rattle off a Yiddish rhyme and do a ridiculous dance with increasing rapidity (to the point where the cast itself can't keep up). It's hard to decide whether to be offended at the ethnic caricature or pitying that they had to revert to such chaotic slapstick.

The musical clearly attempts to be sympathetic to the obstacles Jews faced at the time, noting that prostitution was one of several equally unsavory options for women (including arranged marriage and sweatshop employment). At times, DeCarlo, Rudie and Wrather's script seems on the verge of making this point, but something doesn't quite ring true. How are we supposed to believe these women are victims of circumstance when the story congratulates Rivkele for staying "pure"?

Despite an often impressive score, a cleverly aesthetic set and well-paced direction, "Backstreet" will have to revise its thematic inconsistencies and lapses into the obvious before it can venture past Fourth Street.

THEATER: "Backstreet" runs through April 26 at the Santa Monica Playhouse, 1211 Fourth St. Tickets are $16 to $20 with discounts for students. Rush tickets available on Fridays. Call (310) 394-9779, ext. 1.

LACMA

vagina for a mouth. The eyes, made of two antennaed radios, are wired to the two metallic ear pieces.

Though this representation borders on insanely juvenile, it lightens the mood created by the otherwise concept-heavy works. Also, one wonders how pleasurable it really would be to have, say, a penis for a nose and a vagina for a mouth. Or how great it possibly could be to never see, only exist blindly in a world where artificial noises ceaselessly gain entrance into one's psyche.

Likewise, Rona Pondick's six-by-three-foot glass case of aluminum cartoon figurines, entitled "Jacks," produces a less-than-weighty visual response. The numerous stick-like bodies have faceless baseball-sized heads crammed on top, revealing only gaping mouths lined with teeth. Perhaps Pondick makes a statement on the desire within human kind to consume more, with nowhere to store it.

Maybe she just digs metal toys.

In fact, most of the pieces on display in "From Head to Toe" offer little more than something to look at, with deeper meanings found only after plenty of mental stretching. But then again, if art didn't provoke audiences to exercise their intellectual capacities, museums might as well not exist. And artists, for that matter, may as well all become dental hygienists or plastic surgeons.

But we already have enough of those.

What we need is people to question why these professions exist. Which, in a way, LACMA's "From Head to Toe" helps to answer. Even if in not so obvious a fashion.

ART: "From Head to Toe: Concepts of the Body in Twentieth-Century Art" shows at the Los Angeles County Museum of Art at 5905 Wilshire Blvd. through April 27. Admission is $6 for adults, $4 for seniors and students with ID and free for children younger than 5. For more information call (213) 857-6000.

How to Write an Effective Ad
- Start your ad with the merchandise you are selling. This makes it easier for readers to quickly scan the ads and locate your items.
- Always include the price of your item. Many classified readers simply do not respond to ads without prices.
- Avoid abbreviations—make you ad easy for readers to understand.
- Place yourself in the reader's position, ask what you would like to know about the merchandise, and include that in the ad. Include such information as brand names, colors and other specific descriptions.

Life of the Party!

Party on Ralph!
Actually the party now IS on Ralph!
Thanks for the memories Ralph!
MOST UCLA students drink no more than 4 when they party. So what?
So, students who drink 4 or less have better love lives, are happier with their relationships, and don't become the "Life of the Party".

DONE 4

Now this is fun! Ralph here was demonstrating his uncanny ability to make a total ass of himself. Sure he was fun for awhile. The "Life of the Party", but then Ralph started pounding down the brewskis like a bone dry sea sponge. It was down the hatch and damn the torpedoes! Ralph had a one way ticket to partyland and by jove he was going to live a little. He babbled on and on about some guy named Dick, who had a good head and loved to socialize. This Dick had heard that the party line was long, but if he could adhere to the dress code he could flutter about disguised as a social butterfly. He'd fight class struggle world wide and hold the partying back until spring break, (when he would party hardy, without winding down bottoms up in the student union!) When Ralph finally did shut up (actually he finally passed out, thank God) he once again became the life of the party. He helped a Literature major polish up on her prose with a pretty permanent pen. When Ralph didn't quite make it to the little boy's room, a photojournalism student was there to bravely capture his little accident and a pre-med princess got a chance to try out her new "won't rub off" lipstick on Ralph! What a chump. Hey Ralph! Most UCLA students drink four or less when they party. Some don't drink at all. Ralph drinks too much. He should drink less. He should talk less too. He should bathe more too! Not to mention his breath. It's your life, so party or Ralph! Just remember: When you've done 4 you're done.

OLYMPIC

going to be doing for the next few years," Payne said. "It was disbelief at first and once I finally realized it was going to go, I got nervous about making this year's national team. I'm going to give 110 percent into qualifying and doing well in the Olympics."

Besides Payne and Simmons, who are very likely to be included in the national team again this year, their current coach also heads the national team. After slipping to eighth place at the recent world championships with the previous head coach, the national team members are determined to improve and make one of the six Olympic spots at the 1999 FINA Cup.

"I think it'll be a lot better with Guy," Simmons said. "He's such an awesome coach and he knows so much about the game. He'll bring a lot to the program."

> "We're still focused on the collegiate team because we want to be national champions."
> Coralie Simmons
> Water polo playmaker

Payne agrees.

"I think we're finally going to have the leadership we need," Payne said. "Our overall level of play is going to improve and the national team will be so much better with him. We're going to win!"

So the door has finally opened. Much work still needs to be done, but the willingness is there. Anticipation is lively and determination is even livelier. As for now, however, all the Bruin members of the national team are prioritizing toward their successful collegiate season.

"We're still focused on the collegiate team because we want to be national champions again," said Simmons.

That brings up an interesting question. With the same head coach, and same intensity of winning desire and dedication from its team members, what's going to be different between the national and collegiate water polo experience?

"None," Payne simply replies. "Same game."

VOLLEYBALL

Although Loyola has one player that averages half an ace a game, UCLA has three players that do the same. Setter Brandon Taliaferro averages .57 aces a game while Adam Naeve and Ben Moselle average .5 aces a game.

Scates has said that the serving advantage should be given to UCLA. The Bruins are outserving their opponents 2.3 to .7. In addition, the flexibility in the lineup makes it difficult for opponents to plan its own strategy since one ever knows which lineup will be on the court.

RUGBY

Fenske laughs, adding: "It would be totally offensive to either team if it didn't happen. Either go out for some beer, or sit around and talk over some food."

Have we stumbled upon yet another difference between the men's and women's game?

She laughs.

Though turnout for the games has never made fans pressed for space, these women don't mind, Fenske says.

"Some people who react negatively to (a hard-hitting women's sport) have other issues; they have some couch work to do."

To find out more about women's rugby, call Jill Fenske at (310) 371-0016.

an undefeated season and a chance at nationals. (The top two teams out of 16 division programs are invited to attend.)

"(Rugby) is one of the most demanding sports."

Tam Breckenridge
UCLA women's rugby coach

The team, however, has had to contend with more than just their opponents this season. Storms have forced the team to postpone three games, a frustrating part of playing on outdoor fields with inclement weather.

Because so few high schools have rugby programs, most of the women on the team – which includes four graduate students and a faculty member – had never played rugby before joining the team.

The high level of physical contact was not something that was lost on Breckenridge the first time she saw a game.

"It is one of the most demanding sports, as far as focus, endurance, heart and soul," Breckenridge said. "The first time I saw (a rugby match), I said, 'No way, I would never play this game. It's like, 'I'm gonna bash your head in and run all over you.'"

But the game is addictive, according to Breckenridge, who graduated from UCLA 20 years ago and now works for the university: "Once you get out and play, it's a lot of fun."

In a society in which half of America reserves its Monday nights to watching men smash their heads against each other and reconfigure limbs in ways even contortionists would have trouble duplicating, Fenske says that the brutality of her sport is something that you just have to get used to – and not just because it's women doing the smashing and reconfiguring.

"I'm sure that people think that women's rugby is totally brutal, but we have a little more finesse about the game," she said. "Some people react like, 'It's just wrong, having women hitting each other out there like that.'"

The game, according to both Breckenridge and Fenske, is a little different for the women than it is for the men.

Vicious scowls, merciless hits, gory injuries and trash-talking are all hallmarks of the men's game. Oh, but you'll find all that watching a women's rugby match, too. It is, as is so often the case, the elegance and grace that women bring to the sport that distinguishes them from their male counterparts.

JAMIE SCANLON-JACOBS/Daily Bruin

Bruin rugby players often have to use force to escape from defenders while still keeping possession of the ball.

"We're still at the finesse stage," Breckenridge said. "We use skills more instead of brute strength."

Winning is something these women have grown accustomed to. Yet, oddly enough, it is after, not during, the game that the real personal contact begins.

"Rugby etiquette, I guess you could call it," Fenske said. "After the game, after you're done beating each other up, it's considered just wrong if you don't go out and share a pizza with the other team."

Excuse me?

Catherine von Schwarz, due to a practice-related injury. But Baker said he didn't want to use that as a scapegoat to explain what happened in that final game.

"Catherine is such an intricate part of the team, but by no means am I making excuses for her being out. It's a good experience for the team to go on despite an injury and I'm proud of the comeback. All good teams are able to stay in the game through difficulties and we had our chances to win it. We just didn't get it done and Cal did a good job."

With their first loss of the season, and first loss in 38 games, the Bruins are 9-1 so far this season. This team has only lost three times since 1996, and it holds a 69-3 history for the past two and a half seasons. Ironically, all of their losses were to Cal.

Approaching Thursday's game against USC, Baker anticipates a more fired-up team.

"This group has been very successful, and this doesn't happen very often," Baker said. "I think it will get their concentration and determination higher."

Bruins ready to begin winning streak

BASEBALL: Top freshmen, Sunday's win should help team find path to victory

By Vytas Mazeika
Daily Bruin Staff

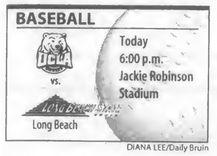
With rays of sun finally penetrating El Niño's wrath, rays of hope are just now visible for the UCLA baseball team.



DIANA LEE/Daily Bruin

After losing six consecutive games to ranked teams, the unranked Bruins (8-10) finally won one game to end their longest losing streak of the season.

"That win (Sunday) was much more important to us," UCLA head coach Gary Adams said. "If they would've won it, it's nice. For us to win it, it was big. It was huge. We just needed that."

Today in a non-conference game against Long Beach State (5-8), the Bruins hope to start a winning streak.

UCLA sends sophomore right-hander Gabe Crecion (1-0 record, 11.17 ERA) to the mound. The 49ers send junior lefty Mike Gallo (0-1, 7.71) to face the hot-hitting Bruins.

Oddly enough, UCLA's run production seems to come from the freshmen instead of the proven veterans. Senior Eric Byrnes and junior Eric Valent hit a combined 3 for 27 (a .111 batting average) against the Trojans this weekend.

However, freshman third baseman Garrett Atkins has five consecutive multi-hit games in which he has hit 11 for 24. Atkins has improved to .377, thanks to his scorching .424 average in league play.

Freshman shortstop Chase Utley is also one of the leading Six-Pac hitters with a .375 average (.314 overall). Freshman designated hitter Michael Hymes is hitting .400 in league play, freshman catcher Jason Green is batting .350 in league play, and freshman designated hitter Nick Lyon hit homers in his first two league at-bats.

"This team can definitely swing the bat," said USC starter Seth Etherton, who threw 136 pitches in 8.2 innings of work Friday night. "They've got a lot of juice throughout the whole lineup. I just had to be careful and try to pitch to their weak spots."

Etherton came within one out of shutting out the Bruins for the first time since 1996, but when he hung a slider and a change-up, Atkins got a single and Utley smashed a double to right field – Atkins moved to third and eventually scored on senior Cassidy Olson's fielder's choice.

"They're always going to be dangerous on offense," USC head coach Mike Gillespie said. "You talk about these Atkins and Utley and they're freshmen. But boy, those are special freshmen. We always feel like this is a team that can really break out on you."

"Atkins and Utley (are) freshmen. But boy, those are special freshmen."

Wizards 96, Lakers 86

The first time Chris Webber touched the ball in the lane, Shaquille O'Neal simply took it away. All Webber could do was stand there like a kid on the playground who had been picked on by his big brother.

When it was over, Webber had his payback and more. He finished with 31 points and 10 rebounds and benefited from a better supporting cast as the Washington Wizards handed the slumping Los Angeles Lakers their second straight loss, 96-86 Monday night.

"You play against a player like that, those type of plays are going to happen," Webber said of his inauspicious start against O'Neal. "I feel I'm the type of player that I'm going to get a couple of those plays, too. You have to keep going, and not be timid to go back in there. I get extra pumped up any time I go against great players."

Hornets 112, Warriors 83

The most impressive scoring streak in the Charlotte Hornets' history was snapped Monday night. But it didn't hurt the club in the least because the Golden State Warriors were in town.

Glen Rice's club-record 135-game run of scoring in double figures ended when he was harassed into nine points on 3-for-11 shooting before he and the rest of Charlotte's starters sat out the fourth quarter of a 112-83 victory.

Spurs 116, Kings 95

Tim Duncan had 29 points and 17 rebounds and twin-tower teammate David Robinson had 22 points and seven blocks as the San Antonio Spurs routed the Sacramento Kings 116-95 Monday night.

Robinson played 28 minutes in his second game after missing six games with a knee injury. San Antonio, the top-ranked defensive team in the league, limited the struggling Kings to 38 percent field-goal shooting – 32 of 85 – and handed Sacramento its seventh straight loss

Kings 2, Canucks 2, Tie

Mark Messier scored shorthanded and Dave Scatchard added a tainted goal Monday night as the Vancouver Canucks tied 2-2 with the Los Angeles Kings.

Nathan LaFayette and Rob Blake scored power-play goals in the first period for the Kings, who are 10-2-3 in last 15 games.

Sean Burke made 29 saves in his first start since Jan. 28, after sitting out six in a row and relieving Arturs Irbe in each of the next two. His best stop came with 12:06 left in regulation, when he slid across the crease and made a leg save on Vladimir Tsyplakov after a perfect cross-ice feed by Jozef Stumpel.

Scatchard tied the score at 9:03 of the second period with his 11th goal, which was upheld by video replay.

Hurricanes 3, Sharks 1

Gary Roberts got two goals and an assist while goalie Trevor Kidd stopped 43 San Jose shots, lifting the Carolina Hurricanes to a 3-1 victory over the Sharks on Monday night.

Roberts assisted on Sami Kapanen's goal early in the second period and then scored second- and third-period goals. Meanwhile, Kidd had a shutout until San Jose's Mike Rathje scored midway through the final period.

Carolina took just 17 shots on goal. In the first two periods alone, the Sharks outshot the Hurricanes 35-13. But Kidd's performance made the difference.

W. BASKETBALL: No. 23 ranking brings national respect but has no bearing on tourney seedings

By David Arnold
Daily Bruin Contributor

With only one week left in the regular season, the UCLA women's basketball team is finally in the rankings, at No. 23 in the AP poll.

After weeks at second in their conference, with wins over No. 8 Duke and previously No. 23 Washington, close losses to No. 5 Stanford and No. 9 Arizona, an overtime loss to No. 7 North Carolina, and season sweeps of six Pac-10 teams, national respect comes at last for the Bruins (18-7, 13-3).

> "It's great we're in (the polls), just for the recognition for the program. Twenty-third is fine for now."
> Kathy Oliver
> Women's basketball head coach

"I couldn't believe it," said UCLA head coach Kathy Olivier. "It's just been a long time coming."

The ranking, which Olivier calls "overdue," is the Bruins' first since a preseason 25th ranking by both Athlon Sports and Street and Smith's magazines.

"It's probably because of our start," said Olivier, referring to the 0-3 season beginning against St. Mary's, George Washington and Notre Dame, none of whom are ranked.

Since that inauspicious start the team has gone 18-4, with losses only to teams currently in the top 10 in the country.

For the women of Westwood this is great news as they make their final push toward an NCAA tournament berth on the road against the Arizona schools.

The ranking has no direct relation to tournament seedings – that's determined by the Ratings Percentage Index (RPI) – but it indicates national acknowledgement of the team.

The official RPI standings won't be released by the NCAA until March 8, but most independent rankings have the Bruins in the mid-30s nationally.

The RPI statistically incorporates a team's winning percentage, schedule strength and opponent's schedule strength by assigning values to them.

"It's great we're in (the polls), just for the recognition for the program," said Olivier. "Twenty-third is fine for now," she said, though she hopes to improve upon that before the next poll comes out.

That's not entirely out of the question, either, because after winning 13 of their last 15, the Bruins are simply en fuego.

Powered by center Janae Hubbard's career highs in minutes (36), points (26) and rebounds (18) on Friday, and point guard Erica Gomez' 10 assists on Sunday (as many as the whole Washington team), the Bruins continued their scorching play of late by averaging 88 points over the weekend.

Still, Olivier claims "the rankings don't mean anything," and that the team only looks for wins, not respect.

But don't let that lead you to believe that it's insignificant for a program that hasn't finished the season in the top 25 since 1992.

2000 Games will be first for women's water polo

OLYMPICS: Bruins ecstatic about addition of sport, chance to play in Sydney

By Steve Kim
Daily Bruin Staff

In the sport of women's water polo, opportunities for post-collegiate players are few and avenues stretch as narrow as they come. It is one of the true amateur sports where no professional league exists and million dollar contracts are offered only in daydreams.

For a long time, women's water polo wasn't even an Olympic sport, while its men's counterpart at least enjoyed that privilege.

That is why the water polo community rejoiced with newly found hope when women's water polo finally became an Olympic sport in October. The news hit home especially in the UCLA water polo community, since several members – senior goalie Nicolle Payne, junior playmaker Coralie Simmons and newly chosen U.S. women's national team head coach Guy Baker – now have a legitimate chance to participate in the Olympics.

"It was great news and the team was excited as a whole," recalls Baker. "It's a very important issue for us because U.S. Water Polo has been trying to get women's water polo a part of the Olympics since 1984 and has not been successful. It's been a long, long battle for a lot of people to make it an Olympic sport."

The issue was proposed before each Olympic Games, and each time, it was denied. Even for the 2000 Sydney Games, women's water polo was initially rejected from participating by the International Olympic Committee (IOC). After a persistent rally by the women's water polo officials of host country Australia, the IOC finally accepted the sport.

> Even just a few years ago, (women's water polo) wasn't popular enough to exist in most high schools.

"The news came over on e-mail and I knew the girls were lifting weights at the time," Baker said. "I caught Nicolle coming out of the weight room and told her. She started crying. Then she ran over and told the rest of the team. They made a big scene – hugging, jumping up and down – in the training room."

Simmons, who participated along with Payne in the recent World Championships with the national team, also remembers that turning point like it was yesterday.

"I was getting iced in the training room and Guy told me," Simmons said. "We freaked out. I was running around looking for Nicolle but we couldn't find each other because we were running around in opposite circles."

Women's water polo came a long way before it was finally recognized as an Olympic sport. Even just a few years ago, when players like Payne and Simmons were recruited, it wasn't popular enough to exist in most high schools. Both Payne and Simmons played on their high school boy's team because there was simply no girl's team.

> "I'm going to give 110 percent into qualifying (for) the Olympics."
> Nicolle Payne
> Women's water polo goalie

Even before they ever thought they had a chance to become Olympians, they played passionately, knowing there would be no huge endorsements, no Olympic glory or recognition.

"It's just a great game," Simmons said. "Once you've been in the pool and played, you don't know the feeling. It's such a fun game to play."

Now, Baker says the sport has gained so much in popularity that all of his current recruits come from high school girl's teams.

"There's been a tremendous growth at the high school level since the addition of a number of college teams," Baker said. "With women's water polo being an Olympic sport, I think you'll see another big growth in the sport."

Before the big news, Payne, like most other collegiate players, planned to go on with her life after graduating and concentrate on her career plans. Things changed unexpectedly, though, and she says she'll gladly put off her intended plans until after the Olympics.

"It's going to change what I'm

The action is intense as players from the women's rugby team scramble for the ball during the "scrum."

W. RUGBY: Hard-hitting game has finesse; UCLA shoots for national title

By Avi Lidgi
Daily Bruin Contributor

Jill Fenske, a fourth-year graduate student in UCLA's chemical engineering department, is a part-time hooker.

And she is quite good at what she does.

"I play forward, which is called a hooker, which many people find amusing," Fenske said with a laugh. "Hookers are the ones that will usually muscle it out for the ball during the scrum."

Scrum?

"Kind of like in football," she explained. "Three people in the front row, with the hooker in the middle and everybody packed together real tight."

And?

"And you hit the other team," she said, another laugh escaping.

Women hitting each other, battling viciously for a ball, muscling it out until they're sore, weary and bruised, and all this with no padding?

"We play like this," Fenske said, displaying windbreakers and a long-sleeved shirt.

Coming off a very successful season that saw the team go to the national championships, the women's rugby team is setting its sights even higher this season.

Seven new players, combined with the experience of returning veterans, have given the rugby team (3-0 so far this season) the confidence needed to shoot for the nationals.

"Team chemistry is great this year," UCLA coach Tam Breckenridge said. "We have a lot of new players and everything is clicking.

"Our goal is to get to nationals and do well."

The team finished third in its division last year and spirits are high, buoyed by the very likely prospect of

Weekend ends on losing note as Cal wins in sudden death

W. WATER POLO: Bruins dominant early on but suffer defeat in overtime

By Steve Kim
Daily Bruin Staff

When a team wins consistently, like the UCLA women's water polo team does, it's sometimes bigger news when they don't win. That is exactly what happened at the UC Santa Barbara Tournament, where they were edged out by UC Berkeley in the final game by a score of 9-8.

The Bruins were dominant in the preliminary and semi-final games. UCLA defeated Occidental 20-0, and blew out UC San Diego 18-2. In the semi-final game, their 10-2 victory against UC Santa Barbara gave all the indications of a sweep as they entered the championship game against Cal. The Bruins had beaten the Golden Bears 11-4 in San Diego just weeks ago.

> "We had our chances to win it. We just didn't get it done and Cal did a good job."
> Guy Baker
> Women's water polo head coach

However, Cal came on strong from the start. The Bears scored six goals compared to UCLA's two by the end of the third quarter. The Bruins rallied to make up the point deficit and, with five seconds left in the game, freshman Kristin Guerin put one in to tie it up.

In overtime, Cal had the first goal, but Mandy McAloon was able to tie the game again at the last second of the three-minute overtime.

Then came the sudden death period where whoever scores first wins. Over eight minutes, both teams had a couple of attempts and misses, and Cal finally put an end to the game with a goal.

"We were sluggish on the offense," said UCLA head coach Guy Baker. "We only had two goals going into the last quarter, but by the fourth quarter, the team was able to get going and do what it was supposed to do."

One factor that played in the struggle against Cal is the Bruins missed a key player, junior

Undefeated Bruins will face pressure cooker

VOLLEYBALL: UCLA to take on professional-level offense in match vs. Loyola Ramblers

By Grace Wen
Daily Bruin Staff

The top-ranked UCLA men's volleyball team will try to maintain its unblemished record tonight.

The Bruins will take on Loyola University of Chicago in a non-conference match in Pauley Pavilion. UCLA will play its eighth match of a 10-match homestand.

The Ramblers (13-2), on the other hand, will be playing its second match of a week long stay in Los Angeles.

Loyola is off to arguably its best start ever having defeated East Coast powers Penn State, Rutgers, George Mason and Lewis. The Ramblers lead the west division in the Midwest Intercollegiate Volleyball Association with an undefeated record.

The ninth-ranked Ramblers have adopted a "pressure cooker" offense that has made them the No. 1 hitting team in the country with a .387 attack percentage. The offense runs six plays for five hitters in every rotation.

"The pressure cooker is a pro-level offense," Loyola head coach Gordon Mayforth said. "It's quicker and more complicated than any other offense you'll see in college volleyball – and it's our way to a championship. But like a pressure cooker, if everything doesn't go right, it can explode in your face."

Outside hitter Dan Schultz averages 5.57 kills a game and will be the focus of UCLA's defense. Schultz, the fifth-ranked digger in the nation, will also be a factor on defense.

UCLA head coach Al Scates admits that little is known about Loyola, a team that UCLA has never played.

"If this team beat Lewis, they've got to be pretty good because Lewis took a game off us," Scates said. "So we just have to size them up as we go and kind of scout them as we go and try to take away whatever they want to do."

Student honored for catching attacker

POLICE: Suspect pleads guilty to assaulting CSO outside Schoenberg Hall

By Nick Rodrigues
Daily Bruin Contributor

Aiding in the arrest of a criminal would not be considered an everyday student activity, but supervisor access control monitor Ilyne-Syl Deliquiña was honored by the University police on Tuesday for doing just that.

Oleg Bogdanov, who was already wanted by Long Beach City Police, physically assaulted CSO Sarah Parga on Jan. 18 at Schoenberg Hall. Parga said that she asked Bogdanov to leave the building and he refused. When she threatened to call the police he attacked her. Afterwards she was taken to the emergency room where she was treated for bruises and lacerations to her face.

> "I'm not a stagnant person, stress makes me move."
> Ilyne-Syl Deliquiña
> Access control monitor

Soon after the incident a suspect composite was distributed to the campus and on Feb. 6, thanks to Deliquiña, Bogdanov was apprehended.

"We consider people of this community as family. We have a problem and we deal with that problem," said Police Chief Clarence Chapman.

Nancy Greenstein, director of police community services, gave praise to all the students involved.

"The system worked, and it shows that every student can make a difference," Greenstein said.

Deliquiña's involvement with the perpetrator began before the assault, during winter break. It was while working as an access monitor at Rieber Hall in December that she first met Bogdanov.

Bogdanov had tried to get into Rieber. When asked, he said he lived in Rieber, and Deliquiña discovered that he didn't. The police were called and CSOs searched the building, but he had already left. It did not occur to Deliquiña that the man she had just encountered could have attacked her.

"He didn't look like he could hurt anyone, he just looked strange," she said.

At that point there were no bulletins out on the suspect, but Deliquiña said that even if there were, she would have confronted him regardless.

"I'm not a stagnant person, stress makes me move. It's my gas, it's a healthy kind of stress," Deliquiña said.

A few weeks later Bogdanov showed up again at Rieber demanding to be let inside. Deliquiña said that his story was believable because he used and gave the same information as before. But again access was denied, and Bogdanov was asked to come back the next day to see the manager, to which he agreed. When Deliquiña saw the suspect on a third occasion, she said that she recognized him but could not place his face.

CHARLES KUO/Daily Bruin

Ilyne-Syl Deliquiña, a AFROTC member, looks on as police Captain Clarence Chapman reads the certificate of appreciation for helping to apprehend a criminal.

Two days later, while in Sunset Village, Deliquiña saw the special bulletin posted by the police, "then it all clicked." While recalling these events, Deliquiña admits to being a little frustrated.

"The first time (we saw him at Rieber) we did what we could, the second we did not call the police because he was compliant," Deliquiña said. "To know he was a criminal and to let him slip away was frustrating."

A few days later the access monitor was in Rieber Hall Cafeteria with some friends when she saw a man eating alone, and this time she took a double take. Bogdanov had dyed his hair from brown to blond.

"When I saw his face, I just knew it was him," Deliquiña said.

She automatically turned to her friend Jennifer Magana, an office assistant for the CSOs, and said, "that's the guy on the poster, watch him."

While Deliquiña left to call the police, Magana and her boyfriend Michael Granvel watched Bogdanov.

"I was a kind of nervous," Magana said. "Knowing that he assaulted someone, I didn't want the guy to see me looking at him."

After a while Bogdanov attempted to leave, so Magana and Granvel asked the manager to distract him.

"I thought, Oh my God! He is walking out! But I didn't want to go

RANKINGS: Jump makes program highest-rated of public universities

By J. Sharon Yee
Daily Bruin Contributor

In the 1998 national report on the Best Business Schools, U.S. News and World Report magazine ranked the Anderson Graduate School of Management eighth.

Previously ranked 17th, the nine-point jump makes Anderson the highest-ranked public business school in the nation.

Business schools at Harvard, Stanford, Columbia, the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and the University of Pennsylvania rounded out the top five. UC Berkeley and the University of Michigan-Ann Arbor tied for 10th.

"I am very proud of the Anderson School," said interim dean John Mamer. "The hard work of all involved makes this school one of the best in the nation – the faculty, students, alumni, staff and the UCLA academic community."

Several specialized programs ranked in the top 10 as well.

The Entrepreneurship program ranked fifth, International Business ranked sixth and the Executive Masters of Business Administration program ranked seventh nationally.

In a recent placement survey conducted by the Career Management Center, annual salaries for Anderson graduates averaged $75,000, with students receiving as much as a $15,000 signing bonus.

In the past six years the school has occupied six different slots, with the highest being 10th in 1994. This year, it shares the eighth spot with Dartmouth University.

"The 1997 drop in rankings to seventeen was a wake-up call to Anderson that we need to market ourselves better," said Heather Mathis, a second-year student, who attributed the rise in ranking to the improvement of the marketing department.

"As a result, Anderson made a deliberate effort to convey a consistent message to the media that we are a top-10 business school," she added.

Despite this year's high ranking, Mamer warned against the universality of the rankings system.

"We must resist the temptation to cater to the rankings in planning and pursuing our intellectual and curricular goals," he said. "If a school has the

Outreach programs given money to woo minorities

USAC: UCOP allots each campus $10,000, student leaders ask if it's enough

By Dennis Lim
Daily Bruin Contributor

The needy bank accounts of student outreach groups will soon receive $10,000, thanks to the appointment of a new Steering Committee – but USAC officers feel that this sum is not enough.

The Steering Committee of the undergraduate student association council (USAC) will disperse money given to them by the University of California Office of the President (UCOP) to increase racial diversity.

Appointees Jessica Lee, chief of staff for the Community Service Commission, and Kendra Fox-Davis, chief of staff for the USAC President's office, were approved for the Steering Committee by USAC Tuesday.

The money, which will be used to enhance racial diversity at the nine UC campuses, comes in response to Proposition 209 and UC Regents' policies SP-1 and SP-2, which banned affirmative action at all UC campuses.

Students at each of the nine UC campuses will receive 10,000 to fund outreach programs that increase racial diversity. Comparatively, UCLA administration-led programs have been allotted $290,000 by UCOP.

Each of the appointees were heavily involved in outreach programs in the past.

"We wanted to appoint people who were closely related to outreach, people who knew what the issues were," said Abi Karlin-Resnick, USAC community service commissioner.

After approving SP-1 and SP-2, the Regents sponsored a study of what the UC system would be like without affirmative action. The study found that in plate of affirmative action programs, more outreach programs aimed

USAC appoints chair of election board

At the general council meeting Tuesday, the Undergraduate Students Association Council (USAC) unanimously approved Anthony Brockington, the former chair of investigations, as the chair of the election board. According to election board bylaws, an appointment should have come before fall quarter.

As the e-board chair, Brockington will oversee the USAC elections in May. His office will investigate allegations proposed by different groups.

Allegations made by Robert Rhoan of violations of election bylaws within USAC went unchecked because of the absence of an e-board chair.

"I am interested in the position because I believe that student government is beneficial to the career of a college student," Brockington said.

"It acts as our primary example of democracy in action and displays how we all can have a voice in the destiny of our institution."

Student leaders are often compensated

From full tuition to annual salaries topping $10,000, universities across the country are offering student government leaders compensation for their efforts.

Student Leader magazine recently surveyed 150 public and private universities; of those, 88 percent gave some type of compensation to student government leaders.

Schools offer stipends, scholarships and cash so students can concentrate on student government without having to worry about part-time jobs, said Butch Oxendine, editor of Student Leader. Paying students also increases interest and professionalism, he said.

At the University of South Florida, top student government members are paid $10,937 a year. Student leaders never lose sight of their loyalties, university officials said.

El Niño spawns rash of allergies

California's El Niño rains have brought a bumper crop of allergy-producing mold and pollen, and people are suffering. Doctors' waiting rooms are clogged with the sniffling, wheezing and itchy-eyed.

"I have patients who haven't had allergy attacks for 15 years coming in with 10 days of horrible allergic symptoms," Dr. Bernard Geller, a Santa Monica allergist, said Tuesday. "They have mountains of tissues alongside their bed."

Los Angeles had its wettest February on record with 13.68 inches of rain, toppling the 1884 record of 13.37.

The rain is stimulating the growth of mold, trees and grass. More misery lies ahead in the summer when weeds and flowers blossom.

Geller thinks rye grass planted to hold back mudslides in fire-scorched areas is a major culprit. He advises keeping windows closed and putting high-efficiency particle air filters in bedrooms.

L.A. City College offers summer England tour

Los Angeles City College is offering a two-week study tour of England during the upcoming summer. The program will run from July 6 to 21.

The program includes planned visits to Stratford-upon-Avon, several museums and the Globe, National and Haymarket theaters in London. Students will gain two units of college credit and stay with British host families.

For $2,500, students will receive round-trip airfare, accommodations (with estimates based on double-occupancy rates), London transit passes, entrance fees and the cost of some excursions.

The program will be led by William G. Thomas. He can be reached at (213) 744-9052.

A Real Boy Scout

David Tuckman has devoted countless hours to community services, and hopes to motivate others to follow his lead

By Michelle Navarro
Daily Bruin Staff

YEN YEN LEE

David Tuckman speaks about his community service activities during a Circle K club meeting.

David Tuckman leaves not even the busiest person with an excuse to hide from community service. He is the salesman for volunteering. But with a record of about 40 to 50 organizations under his belt, this preacher of goodwill also practices what he preaches.

Volunteering is what the fourth-year political science student is all about. Beginning as far back as the second grade, when most kids only had cooties and Legos on their minds, Tuckman was already involved with an organization famous for service, the Boy Scouts of America.

"When he was younger, before he was driving, I was running around town taking him everywhere," said Morris Tuckman of his son. "It's a pleasure now that he's driving."

His early involvement may be attributed to the fact that the majority of Tuckman's family is or was involved with service as well.

"My whole family is community-service oriented," he said, "I have been raised knowing that as a citizen in America we have so many advantages compared with the rest of the world, that we're really privileged and we should try to give back to our own citizens and the world."

Tuckman's father, a U.S. Treasury agent, was involved with the Boy Scouts for 10 years, his mother is a teaching assistant and several of his relatives are active in scouting and law enforcement.

At Grant High School, Tuckman joined several organizations, including the Key Club, a community service group, Staff Diversity Board, and Hands Across Campus, a group devoted to promoting campus unity and understanding. Tuckman also ran for the track and field team.

"He was one of the hardest workers we had out there," said Pat Pinkston, who was the track and field coach at the time. "He would do any work out we put out there for him. He was very loyal and worked hard."

In January of 1993, Tuckman received the Eagle Scout Award – the highest scout rank which requires the recipient to prove proficiency in certain crafts and skills.

"(Becoming an Eagle Scout) taught me to fight for what I believe in, to give back to the community, that I should have respect for my country and that I should try to help other people," Tuckman said. "It's helped me to become a leader and shape who I am today."

It is a difficult honor to achieve, one that less than 2.5 percent of Boy Scouts have actually accomplished. The elite list includes such well-known leaders like former President Gerald Ford, astronaut John Glenn, actor James Stewart and director Steven Spielberg.

Now the young student from North Hollywood is among them, and with his long history of service and his current passion and zeal to make a difference, he has proved his worth.

Not only have the Boy Scouts recognized this, but so has the U.S. Congress. Last year, Tuckman was one of 24 recipients from across the nation given the Congressional Award for excellence in volunteerism, personal development, physical fitness and exploration.

"I was shocked," Tuckman said, "I couldn't believe it. It's the highest honor, the biggest in my life. It shows the whole country how dedicated we Bruins are to community service."

For the exploration and physical fitness factors, Tuckman applied his role as co-captain of the track and field team at Grant High School and the two summers he spent at the U.S. Marine Corps' Pride and Guts training program at Camp Pendleton.

"It was a unique experience," he said, "I learned what it was like taking orders and having a lack of liberty. I was the only Eagle Scout there, so they expected more from me."

If the world expects more from Tuckman because of who he is, than he will give it to them. Recently Tuckman has been active as a volunteer or as a leader in a slew of organizations both on and off campus.

Among the ones the UCLA student spoke of the most were the Circle K Club (the college version of the Key Club), Alpha Phi Omega – a fraternity for college Boy and Girl Scouts, Jewish Student Union, LAPD Explorer Scouts, American Red Cross, Model United Nations, Ha'am Newsmagazine, Transfer Students Association and the Student Alumni Association.

"Most of my time is devoted to school and community service," Tuckman said. "For me it's amazing, I ask myself how I do all of this and I don't know."

While in the LAPD Explorer Scouts, Tuckman kept himself busy in the outreach program where he would visit high schools to talk about the DARE program to prevent students from using illegal drugs.

"If you talk to people when they are young and get them at that point," he said, "it can get them on the right track."

Tuckman is very involved with the youth via scouts as well, however he said he also devotes time to adults, particularly the homeless.

"You always see people who are walking the streets and you realize there are certain situations where anyone can become homeless," Tuckman said, while talking about Circle K's "project angel-food," a service that calls for the volunteers to package and ship food to AIDS patients, "we have a duty to give back to the community, we have so much freedom and opportunity and we should take advantage of that.

The dedicated Bruin is extremely adamant in his mission to get others to volunteer too. He agrees somewhat with the skeptical view that one person can't make that much of a difference. But, he believes that if one person could set off a chain reac-

UCLA officials police information superhighway

REGULATION: Sometimes students don't know they violate computer policy

By Andy Shah
Daily Bruin Contributor

Computer users may be breaking the law and not even know it.

UCLA's Acceptable Use Agreement is a set of regulations for appropriate computer use that one agrees to when registering a Bruin Online account. And administrators handle about five violations, either deliberate or unintentional, of that agreement each quarter.

"Any violation which infringes on the rights of the community or any other individual, we take seriously," said Amy Lubitz, Judicial Affairs Coordinator for the Office of Residential Life (ORL).

The most common violations include pyramid schemes, possession of illegal software, e-mail bombing and spamming.

Also, e-mails containing threats or sexually harassing messages are considered possible offenses.

In one case, a student was investigated for allowing others to hear new CDs via his web site – a violation of copyright laws.

The problem started about two years ago, said Lubitz, who investigates allegations of computer misuse. About sixty percent of them, she said, are deliberate violations of the agreement.

For example, a student who sends an e-mail bomb, which consists of sending thousands of e-mails to one person, is a deliberate violation.

> UCLA officials act as a fire alarm: they respond to complaints rather than monitoring computer use.

However, a student may unknowingly put movie clips on their web site, which is a violation of the agreement.

Consequences of the agreement range from being found 'not responsible' to dismissal from the university.

The Dean of Students office is responsible for rendering judgments on cases.

"Most of the time it's a warning, disciplinary probation or suspensions," Lubitz said.

"A couple (of students) have lost computer privileges for a limited amount of time," but no students have ever been dismissed.

Sometimes students haven't read the agreement carefully, so they get a warning informing them of proper computer use, said Bonnie Mika, manager for Office of Academic Computing customer relations.

"We try to take the approach where we inform the student it's inappropriate behavior. Sometimes they just don't know," Mika said.

To detect computer violations, UCLA officials act as a fire alarm: they respond to complaints rather than monitoring computer use.

"Normally complaints are given from students or another university's webmaster. There is no internal 'big brother' mechanism," Lubitz said.

The Dean's office, UCLA police department or student affairs office may also get involved, depending on the severity of the situation.

The Student Technology Center is responsible for identifying the origin of the problem, said Michael Schilling, manager of the Student Technology Center (STC) and directory of technology for UCLA Business and Finance.

High court protects local officials

DECISION: Individual lawmakers can't be sued for motives of their votes

By Richard Carelli
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Tens of thousands of local lawmakers, such as city council members, cannot be sued for their votes even if they had illegal or discriminatory motives, the Supreme Court ruled Tuesday.

The unanimous decision for the first time gave local officials the same "absolute immunity" from civil rights lawsuits their federal, state and regional counterparts have long enjoyed when introducing or voting on legislation.

"Absolute immunity for local legislators ... finds support not only in history but also in reason," Justice Clarence Thomas wrote as the court killed a lawsuit against two former Fall River, Mass., city council members.

"Whether an act is legislative turns on the nature of the act, rather than on the motive or intent of the official performing it," Thomas added.

Tuesday's ruling does not shield city officials from lawsuits stemming from the many administrative matters they carry out, such as hiring and firing employees or dealing with the public. Neither does it prevent people who believe their rights were violated by some legislative action from suing the local government.

But individual lawmakers cannot be the targets of such lawsuits. In other words, you still can sue city hall but not the folks who help run it.

National League of Cities President Brian O'Neill, a Philadelphia City Council member, called the ruling "a clear and welcome acknowledgment that elected municipal officials shouldn't have to worry about being taken to court for trying to meet their responsibilities to vote on public policy issues."

He said the ruling "will assure that our city halls and county courthouses are open forums."

The decision threw out a $231,000 damage award against two former Fall River officials for eliminating a city worker's job after she complained that another worker used racial slurs.

Janet Scott-Harris had been Fall River's first African American administrator when she was hired in 1987 to head the Health and Human Services Department.

Jay Grenig, a Marquette University law professor who had studied the case, applauded the ruling. "The mischief that could have been created by going back and determining motivation for a particular vote would have been tremendous," he said. "There's no personal liability but the person who has been discriminated against still has a remedy – sue the city."

Bruce Assad, who represented one of the two Fall River officials, said allowing such lawsuits against local lawmakers would have been catastrophic. "No city hall in America would have been safe," he said. "Every elected official's vote would have been the potential subject of a lawsuit."

But Harvey Schwartz, the Boston lawyer who represented Scott-Harris, said the decision "creates a manual for violating someone's rights at the local level and getting away with it."

Scott-Harris in 1990 accused a longtime city employee of repeatedly using racial slurs. In early 1991, that employee agreed to accept a 60-day suspension without pay.

A month earlier, however, Scott-Harris was told her job would be eliminated as a cost-cutting measure. Other city employees' jobs later were eliminated as well, but she was the only administrator laid off.

The City Council approved the elimination of Scott-Harris' job. Meanwhile, the suspended city employee was reinstated 18 days early by then-Mayor Daniel Bogan, and a new job was created for her.

Scott-Harris' lawsuit named Bogan, then-City Council member Marilyn Roderick, who headed a committee that voted to eliminate the job, and the city as defendants.

The lawsuit, invoking a federal civil rights law, alleged that the job had been eliminated because of racial bias and in retaliation for Scott-Harris' exercise of her free-speech rights to complain about racial slurs.

Former drug czar of Mexico convicted for abuse of power

PRISON: Rebollo jailed; sentencing on conspiracy charges still not decided

The Associated Press

MEXICO CITY — Mexico's former anti-drug czar was sentenced Tuesday to more than 13 years in prison for abuse of authority and weapons violations.

It was the first sentence handed down against Gen. Jesus Gutierrez Rebollo, who was arrested in February 1997 and charged with being on the payroll of Mexico's top cocaine smuggler. Those charges are still pending.

Judge Armando Baez Espinoza sentenced Gutierrez Rebollo to 13 years, nine months and three days in prison, according to Jose Manuel Alvarez, personal secretary to Deputy Attorney General Alfonso Navarrete Prida. Navarrete Prida is overseeing the prosecution of Gutierrez Rebollo.

The general is being held at the maximum-security Almoloya prison in Toluca, 35 miles west of Mexico City, where the sentence was handed down.

Gutierrez Rebollo, a well-regarded military commander of the Guadalajara area, had been in the military for 42 years when he was appointed drug czar.

The army became suspicious when he moved from a modest house to a luxurious apartment in the posh Bosque de las Lomas area of Mexico City. Prosecutors say the apartment was provided by Amado Carillo Fuentes, then Mexico's top drug smuggler.

Gutierrez Rebollo's arrest endangered Mexico's certification by the United States as an ally in the fight against drug smuggling in 1996, but the United States ended up certifying Mexico.

Mexico was certified again last week with relatively little controversy.

Lawmakers strike it rich in Puerto Rico

DONATIONS: Campaign funding hopes to affect self-determination vote

By Bob Hohler
The Boston Globe

WASHINGTON — In the great money hunt for the 1996 elections there gleamed an offshore gem: Puerto Rico.

The Caribbean hotspot, whose leaders were seeking a vote on self-determination after nearly a century as a U.S. territory, generated a remarkable $2.75 million in contributions for federal campaigns beyond the island, including more than $1 million for President Clinton's reelection effort and nearly $280,000 for the three Kennedys in Congress.

Now, Puerto Rico's leaders are closer to their goal.

With Clinton's endorsement and the backing of many lawmakers who reaped substantial donations from Puerto Rico, a contentious bill that would permit the island's citizens to vote this year for either statehood, independence, or continued territorial status is scheduled for House action on Wednesday.

Although nearly 60 percent of Puerto Rico's 3.8 million residents remain below the federal poverty level, the Democratic Party and Clinton's reelection campaign handily raised a combined $1.2 million in 1995 and 1996 on the island, which is heavily Democratic.

And no politician raised more money in Puerto Rico in 1995 and 1996 than Senator Edward M. Kennedy, who was reelected in 1994 and does not face another race until 2000. Kennedy collected $93,800 for his own campaign and $95,000 for the Committee for a Democratic Majority, which largely exists to fund his political travels to support other Democratic candidates. Most of the money for Clinton's reelection had been funneled through the Democratic National Committee.

Kennedy's son, Representative Patrick J. Kennedy of Rhode Island, followed the family trail to Puerto Rico, raising $42,500 on the island for his 1996 campaign. And Senator Kennedy's nephew, Representative Joseph P. Kennedy II of Brighton, collected $47,000.

"The political community in Puerto Rico has supported the Kennedy family since the time of President Kennedy," said Senator Kennedy's spokeswoman, Kathy McKiernan.

All three Kennedys have favored allowing Puerto Rico to determine its political future. The referendum, which some lawmakers have vowed to block in the House, would be Puerto Rico's first vote on self-determination officially sanctioned by the White House and Congress since the United States seized the island colony from Spain in 1898.

Emotions already are running high. "We have added 100 years to the longest running colony in the history of mankind, and we ought to do something about it," said Representative Jose E. Serrano in a House speech Feb. 26 that foreshadowed the pending debate. Serrano, a New York Democrat, had emigrated

Bill Gates testifies at Senate hearing

TRIAL: Microsoft defends itself against allegations of monopoly aspirations

By Rob Wells
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Microsoft Chairman Bill Gates came under intense questioning at a Senate hearing Tuesday as he was asked repeatedly whether his company restricts Internet businesses from promoting products of rival Netscape Communications Corp.

"You've been somewhat hard to nail down on a very specific question," Senate Judiciary Chairman Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, said in his dogged questioning of Gates. "Do you put any limitation on content providers that limit them ... for advertising or promoting Netscape?"

"Every Internet content provider that has a business relationship with Microsoft is free to develop content that uses competitors' platforms and standards," Gates replied.

Hatch persisted, saying Gates wasn't responding to the question. At one point, Hatch became visibly exasperated with the Microsoft executive's responses. "It's a very simple question," Hatch said.

Gates later replied that Internet businesses that provide news, entertainment or other "content" to web pages cannot promote Netscape on only a limited number of Web pages that link to a Microsoft service that simplifies navigating the Internet.

"On the pages that you link through the channel guide ... on those pages you don't have a competitive product," Gates said. The "channel guide" is a feature of Microsoft's Internet Explorer that links computer users to other companies' Web pages.

Microsoft's contracts with Internet businesses came under sharp focus at the hearing on the future of competition in the software industry. Earlier, Gates mounted a determined defense, arguing his company does not have a monopoly in the software business and urged the government to keep hands off the industry.

"In the end, the software industry, which contributed over $100 billion to the national economy last year is an open economic opportunity for any entrepreneur in America," Gates said.

Government control would only restrict innovation, he said.

With the appearance of Gates packing the hearing room, Hatch said Microsoft's "breathtaking growth ... has, for many, raised serious questions about the future of competition and innovation in the software industry."

Sen. Herb Kohl, D-Wis., was more pointed. "Mr. Gates, no one – no matter how powerful – is above the law," he said. He and the other senators

Egypt finishes latest phase in restoring ancient tombs

HISTORY: Pharaonic pyramids open to public viewing for first time ever

By Tarek El-Tablawy
The Associated Press

CAIRO, Egypt — Egypt opened 10 Pharaonic tombs and three small pyramids to the public for the first time ever Tuesday, completing a key stage in a major overhaul of its ancient sites.

Officials reopened the pyramid of King Menkaure, the smallest of the three great pyramids of Giza, after extensive repairs.

Though discovered in 1924, the 10 tombs weren't opened to the public until Tuesday.

The decade-long restoration effort involves shoring up the Sphinx and repairing several other tombs and the burial chambers of the great pyramids, including the largest built by Pharaoh Cheops. Officials would not say how much money has been spent.

Menkaure's pyramid, the smallest of the great pyramids, was closed last year to allow workmen to reinforce walls, erase graffiti and install a new ventilation system.

The pyramids of three more queens – adjacent to Menkaure's – are to be renovated in the next phase of work at Giza.

Of the three pyramids opened Tuesday, the largest is the one for Cheops' mother, Queen Hetepheres. It once rose to a height of about 100 feet but its smooth, limestone casing has been scavenged through the years, exposing the jagged and crumbled underlying stones.

"It is a complete clean-up," said the head of the Supreme Council

U.S. argues with U.N. over Iraq resolution

POLICY: Many countries claim Security Council only has power to attack

By Robert H. Reid
The Associated Press

UNITED NATIONS — A U.N. warning to Iraq gives Washington the go-ahead to attack if Baghdad blocks weapons inspections, the U.S. ambassador said Tuesday. Most other Security Council members sharply disagreed.

Envoys from many countries, including longtime U.S. allies, said only the Security Council has the authority to determine whether Iraq has breached the weapons inspections deal – and what should be done if it does.

The dispute had been the main obstacle to quick approval of a resolution endorsing Secretary-General Kofi Annan's agreement with Iraq to open all sites, including eight presidential palaces, to U.N. arms inspectors.

Annan said if his deal holds, "we will be moving on to a period when Iraq will complete its obligations and the council can begin thinking of lifting the sanctions" imposed more than seven years ago.

After days of intensive negotiations, the 15-member council on Monday night unanimously approved a resolution endorsing the agreement and warning Iraq of the "severest consequences" if it fails to comply.

"This gives us the green light to approach our policy of diplomacy and force and it shows to the world once again that the onus of complying with this agreement is with Iraq," U.S. Ambassador Bill Richardson said Tuesday morning on NBC's "Today."

Asked if the resolution gives the green light for a U.S. attack, Richardson replied, "The answer is yes. And we already had that green light.

"I think this resolution is drafted as such so it is perfectly clear that any member state can take unilateral action if that member state feels there is a grevious violation," he added.

Further making clear the United States was prepared for conflict, the Pentagon announced it would start vaccinating all 36,000 American servicemen and women in the Persian Gulf against anthrax in case of Iraqi germ warfare.

Vatican condemns human cloning

VATICAN CITY — A Vatican panel issued a stinging condemnation of human cloning Tuesday and warned against the misuse of genetic information. The Vatican's report was issued after a year-long study.

Human cloning, the panel said, "represents a grave attack on the dignity of conception and on the right to an unrepeatable, unpredetermined set of genes."

The Pontifical Academy on Life also warned that using genetic information to "suppress" malformed or diseased embryos and fetuses amounts to a new form of "selective eugenics."

The Academy's report wrapped up a year of study on the potential effects of current research into human genetics.

The Vatican has in the past called for a ban on human cloning. It also forbids artificial fertilization, abortion and birth control.

China responds to abuse allegations

BEIJING — China detained more than 200,000 people last year without charges or trial, Amnesty International said Tuesday in a report alleging human rights abuses in China.

Beijing responded by accusing the London-based group of making irresponsible allegations and urging the organization to change its tactics.

In the past year, Amnesty International said it has documented widespread torture, grossly unfair trials, ill-treatment in police cells and the extensive use of the death penalty in China.

The report also accused China of sending more than 200,000 people last year to labor camps without charges or trial. Foreign Ministry spokesman Zhu Bangzao criticized the report today at a twice-weekly media briefing.

"Amnesty International often makes use of some hearsay or ill-based reports to launch irresponsible accusations against China," said Zhu, who refused to comment on specific allegations in the report.

The government contends that abuses are investigated and punishments are handled according to law by an independent judiciary.

Amnesty International said justice in China remains unpredictable with certain groups being singled out for rough treatment.

California water district under investigation

SACRAMENTO — A special state Senate committee will investigate reports of wrongdoing by a coalition linked to the giant Metropolitan Water District, which supplied water to 16 million people in Southern California.

Recent reports have accused the Partnership for Regional Water Reliability of spending $12,000 in public funds to dig up dirt on state and local government officials in Southern California, Sen. Ruben Ayala, D-Rancho Cucamonga, said Tuesday.

He said the partnership, a coalition of 12 MWD member water agencies, wanted to influence the officials' future water development decisions.

"There's only one use for that kind of information," Ayala said. "These agencies have demonstrated an astonishing lack of judgment and disregard for the use of public funds."

He said the committee will look into how much MWD was involved in the activities.

MWD spokesman Rob Hallwachs said MWD would cooperate fully with the committee, but knew nothing about the information gathering.

"They (the partnership) made an extraordinary effort to keep us out of their loop at Met. We didn't really know anything about what they had done," he said.

State bond measure barely passes

EDUCATION: Bill to build, repair schools anticipates tough fight in Assembly

By Steve Lawrence
The Associated Press

SACRAMENTO – The state Senate approved a record $9.2 billion school and university bond measure Tuesday evening after an ailing lawmaker flew from San Diego to support it.

The 28-6 vote – one more than the bare two-thirds majority needed for approval by the 40-member Senate – sent the bill to the Assembly, where it faces slimmer chances of passing.

Five Republicans broke ranks with their leaders and Gov. Pete Wilson to join 22 of the house's 23 Democrats and an independent to back the bill. All six no votes were cast by Republicans.

The bill, which would put the biggest bond measure in California history on the June 2 ballot, stalled Tuesday morning two votes short of approval. Supporters picked up one vote when Sen. William Craven, R-Oceanside, was pushed into the chamber in a wheelchair at 5:30 p.m. after flying to the capital from San Diego. Craven suffers from emphysema and diabetes.

However, the bill was still two votes short because a Democrat who supported the measure on the first roll call Tuesday morning, Sen. Charles Calderon, D-Montebello, was missing for the final vote.

After Senate President Pro Tem John Burton, D-San Francisco, threatened to keep the house in session for several more hours until Calderon returned from Los Angeles, three other Republicans voted for the bill.

Democratic leaders had announced they would try putting the measure on the June ballot after negotiations between Republicans and Democrats failed to produce a school financing package that also addressed the related issues of local school bonds and school fees imposed on new housing.

Democrats and some Republicans want to allow voters to approve local school bond measures by simple majorities instead of two-thirds votes. But most Assembly Republicans are opposed, and they have enough votes to block the change.

On the other hand, Democrats say they won't approve the strict limits on developer fees sought by Republicans without a change in the local bond vote.

In debate on the bill, Democrats stressed that low interest rates make it a good time for the state to borrow money by selling bonds, that polls show that voters are willing to approve a big school bond proposal and that California has a huge need to repair and build classrooms.

"We simply cannot wait any longer," said Sen. Jack O'Connell, D-San Luis Obispo. "We cannot build schools overnight ... (and) we know we simply have to provide the facilities for our school children ..."

State officials say California needs $30 billion to $40 billion over the next 10 years to repair, upgrade and expand school facilities. The last time voters approved a state school bond proposal was in March 1996, and the success rate for local school bonds is about 50-50.

But Senate Republican leader Rob Hurtt, R-Garden Grove, suggested that voters wouldn't approve $9.2 billion in bonds in one lump.

"It is so high it does not have a chance of passing," he said. "The people of California have never voted for anything of this huge amount."

And Sen. Ray Haynes, R-Temecula, contended the measure would put the state too deeply in debt and that California would be better off taking a pay-as-you-go approach to school construction rather than borrowing funds.

But Democrats said the state has relatively low debts, is rapidly paying them off and that it makes good business sense to borrow now when interest rates are low.

"We have a need to build 12 classrooms a day just to keep up with class-size reduction and enrollment growth," said Sen. Mike Thompson, D-St. Helena.

The Democrats' bill would authorize the sale of $9.2 billion in general obligation bonds, $4.6 billion immediately. The rest would be available starting in the 2000-01 fiscal year.

El Niño could stay around until late May, early June

WEATHER: Meteorological pattern still producing severe damage globally

By Alexander G. Higgins
The Associated Press

GENEVA – El Niño will wreak more havoc on world climate patterns, U.N. meteorologists predicted Tuesday, saying the weather phenomenon would spawn storms and drought stretching into May.

The World Meteorological Organization said parts of the western and southern United States face more troubles next month, though it predicted El Niño would weaken from May to July.

"Increased storminess and wetter-than-normal conditions are expected to continue over California and the southern third of the United States," it said, adding that it will remain warmer over much of central North America.

Drier than normal conditions are expected over northern South America and parts of southern Africa, the report said.

It also will continue to be drier than usual in Indonesia, where forest fires are prompting fears of a return of the choking haze that covered much of Southeast Asia just months ago.

The El Niño update issued Tuesday was the fourth such report by the U.N. agency. It refined earlier predictions that El Niño would continue into late spring and gave an accounting of some of the worst damage caused by the weather pattern:

In Kenya, about 1,500 people have been killed since October by malaria spread by flood waters.

Peru and Ecuador have faced "tremendous downpours" with up to five times the normal annual rainfall in a single day in coastal areas.

Guyana and Papua New Guinea, on opposite sides of the Pacific, have been hit by severe drought.

Colombia has been hit by both extremes, with heavy rainfall threatening landslides on the Pacific coast and forest fires raging inland.

El Niño affects weather patterns, creating droughts in some areas and heavier-than-normal rains in others.

Forecasters are now working on what weather pattern will follow this El Niño, which has been the strongest on record.

A return to normal is considered the most likely, but a reverse pattern – known as La Niña – remains a possibility, the report said.

La Niña, a pool of colder-than-normal water in the Pacific, has the opposite effect to El Niño, bringing heavy rain where it was dry and drought where it was wet.

PUERTO RICO

from Puerto Rico.

However, Puerto Ricans had more at stake than self-determination in their massive outpouring of campaign contributions.

A review of Federal Election Commission records showed that Puerto Rican donors with major interests in government policies as diverse as Medicaid spending and building contracts contributed hundreds of thousands of dollars to influential Washington politicians in both major parties.

All told, more money flowed into the campaign finance system from Puerto Rico, whose residents cannot vote for president, than flowed from many states, including Alaska and Hawaii.

Moreover, many Puerto Ricans were savvy about their giving. In total, they contributed more than $1 million in unlimited and unregulated donations known as soft money, which fund-raisers for both parties craved for the 1996 elections.

Indeed, Puerto Ricans contributed nearly as much soft money in 1995 and 1996 as residents of New Hampshire, Maine, and Vermont combined.

Also, millions of dollars were donated by political action committees for businesses that benefit from special tax breaks on the island.

Clinton, speaking last week at a Democratic Governors Association fund-raising dinner, expressed his support for Puerto Rico's vote on self-determination.

"We have made Puerto Ricans citizens," he said. "We have drafted them into the armed forces. We extend most laws to them, especially those that are convenient to us. To use their culture, but to bar them from voting rights and responsibilities in our country, if they choose to seek them by majority vote, is wrong."

Much of the Democratic money that flowed from Puerto Rico was generated by fund-raiser Miguel Lausell, a San Juan lawyer. Lausell and his wife, Marisol, also contributed $126,000 to Democratic committees and candidates, including $1,000 to Senator Kennedy.

The Republican Party did not fare as well as the Democrats, raising a total of $210,000 in contributions in 1995 and 1996.

Yet two GOP candidates for the presidential nomination ranked second and third to Senator Kennedy among the top individual recipients. Bob Dole collected nearly $132,000 from Puerto Rico, and former Tennessee Governor Lamar Alexander took in nearly $106,000.

Notable among the Republican donors was Eduardo Lopez Ballori, who with his wife, Conchita, and his advertising firm gave about $21,000 to GOP committees and candidates, including $1,000 to Dole.

In 1991, a federal judge in New York cleared Lopez Ballori of felony charges stemming from his secret reimbursement to friends, relatives, and business associates for $75,000 in political contributions. Much of the money went to Senator Alfonse M. D'Amato, a New York Republican, and some went to Dole.

In court, Lopez Ballori's lawyers acknowledged the secret reimbursements but prevailed in their argument that he did not knowingly cause federal records to be falsified. Lopez Ballori went on to serve in Dole's 1996 campaign.

Meanwhile, the Democratic Party had a notable Puerto Rican donor in its ranks. Ruben Lebron Velez, who contributed $127,250 for the 1996 elections, became briefly embroiled in controversy last year after the White House released a videotape that showed him trying to give a handful of checks to Donald Fowler, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, in the executive mansion in 1995.

Fowler asked Lebron Velez, who apparently was unaware of the law against making campaign contributions on federal property, to hold the checks until after they left the White House. But the incident raised questions about whether Lebron Velez, who owns one of Puerto Rico's largest building companies, was seeking special treatment for a land deal in San Juan that required approval from the Department of Housing and Urban Development.

HUD granted tentative approval for the deal two months after the White House meeting. But after Andrew Cuomo became HUD secretary last year, he withdrew the tentative approval, citing the deal as a bad investment for the government. The White House and Lebron Velez denied any wrongdoing.

RANKINGS

courage to change and innovate, the standard will eventually be redefined."

"We pursued our goal of creating intellectual capital and entrepreneurial leaders for the global information age, with little concern for how it would impact the rankings," he continued.

"Everyone here knows the rankings need to be taken with a grain of salt," said Jeffrey Ryskamp, an Anderson student.

"Placing too much importance on these rankings causes people to ignore the other fine traits and specific needs that certain schools provide," he added.

Unlike a similar survey conducted by the National Research Council every 10 years, U.S. News and World Report collects data and re-ranks graduate programs, including business, every one to three years, keeping their research as current as possible.

Using a combination of statistical data and reputation data, the programs are often assessed by data and interviews collected from the schools themselves. The statistics usually fall into two different categories, inputs and outputs.

Inputs consist of qualities that students bring to the education experience, while outputs indicate the success of the program in preparing the students for their respective fields.

In determining the criteria for ranking the nation's three hundred accredited MBA programs, the magazine looked to three different areas of assessment: reputation, placement success and student selectivity.

Criteria include administrators' assessment of their MBA programs, graduates' median starting salaries, average Graduate Management Admission Test scores and average undergraduate grade point averages.

A high ranking will most likely cause an increase in the number of prospective applicants and interested employers.

"Whether we want to admit it or not, rankings have a major influence on how well Anderson recruits students, faculty and prospective employers," said Mathis.

Ryskamp acknowledged the significance of the rankings but looked to another reason for an increase in applications.

"Look at the weather conditions at any of the schools ranked above or below us," he said. "Would you want to go anywhere else?"

CSO

after him," Magana said.

The manager asked Bogdanov who he was, to which he replied that he was an assistant professor. Meanwhile, Deliquiña was still on the phone to the police.

"The minute I got off the phone I saw UCPD arrive," Deliquiña said.

Bogdanov was arrested immediately without incident. When asked how she felt about her attacker's arrest, Parga said, "relieved."

"I was just glad that somebody had the presence of mind to call the police," Parga said.

According to Sgt. John Adams, Bogdanov was tried on Monday where he pled guilty to assault with a deadly weapon (his fists), and was given three years probation with the conditions that he stay away from the victim and UCLA. Adams pointed out that Bogdanov still has charges pending from Long Beach.

Chapman praised the CSO program, describing it as a critical part of UCPD that "serves as the eyes and ears of the Police department."

"Sometimes (CSOs) confront people who are violent," Chapman said. "Not being officers, they have not got the equipment to deal with them."

After describing the events that occurred to Parga, Chapman said, "We wanted to get this person."

Parga took only one week off from her duties after her attack. She is described by her fellow workers as a "strong personality."

"What happened to me is one of those things that happens sometimes," Parga said. "I don't want my life to be ruined by this."

TUCKMAN

tion, then things can happen. That's one of the reasons why he chose UCLA.

"I came to UCLA because I heard so much about how it was dedicated to doing service," Tuckman explained. "One thing I like about UCLA is that you can motivate other people so they'll be leaders and the chain will continue. We are the future of the country."

He hopes that by setting an example, others will be motivated to do service work as well.

"I just hope that through all the leadership I have done, I can motivate," he said. "Hopefully, a freshman will see this and say 'wow, this is amazing, look at all the service. If he can do it, I can do it.' If that person gets out there and volunteers, I'll be happy."

Being David Tuckman demands a lot of work and time. So much so that even friends question his dedication to others and lack of attention to himself – in other words, how can he have a life?

Tuckman retaliates by saying that when working with people he cares about in a club, he tends to have fun and it evolves into a social activity. With an exasperated, yet defensive hint in his voice Tuckman said, he has a life.

"I'm an athlete, student, student leader, and volunteer, and believe me I will find time to do social activities in my schedule. I have a life," Tuckman declared, "Some people would disagree with that but there's a life in there somewhere."

Somewhere, between all the hours of service, the selfish fun exists. For many, however, that's not enough. When it comes down to a choice between going to a basketball game or going to feed the homeless, how many honestly would choose the latter?

Tuckman has a motivation that's rare, a motivation that is born from optimism and the belief that he can make changes.

"If I didn't believe I could help alleviate problems in the community, country or the world, then I think I wouldn't be involved. But I would at least give it a try," Tuckman said.

"Everyone should try. You don't have to rank in thousands of hours to make a difference. Whatever you do, it will benefit someone, the important thing is to get out there."

Tuckman implores for his fellow students to give volunteering a shot.

"Then you'll understand how I feel and what service means to me. Just take the first step," the volunteering salesman invites, "it's never too late."

OUTREACH

specifically at historically under-represented groups were needed to maintain diversity.

Originally, the UC Student Affairs Office proposed to match the $10,000 offered by the UCOP but later rescinded, saying they disagreed with the distribution of the money.

Student groups vying for the money will have to petition the Steering Committee for part of the $10,000.

"All the money will go to student-initiated programs in existence or (that) students will put together in the future," said Assistant Vice-Chancellor of Student Affairs Administration Jane Permaul.

USAC hopes by counting on student groups to do outreach, UC outreach will take a different approach, explained USAC President Kandea Mosley.

"It is important that we have a student majority on the committee because student groups have historically taken a more holistic approach to recruiting students," she said.

> "It's a pathetic attempt ...to make a difference,"
> Abi Karlin-Resnick
> USAC community service commissioner

However, doubt still remains as to the real effect $10,000 will have on admission rates of disadvantaged students.

Many close to the committee lament the small amount of money allocated and the short amount of time they have to use it.

"Chances are $10,000 won't have any effect. It's a pathetic attempt by the (UC) President's office to make a difference," Karlin-Resnick said.

"Also, we'll only have until June to distribute the money. Three months simply isn't enough time," Karlin-Resnick continued.

To have an effective outreach program, a more long-term program stressing closer student counseling would be needed, said those close to the committee.

"$10,000 isn't a lot of money, and there isn't a lot of time to do much with it, but if we can educate someone about what classes to take, or how to fill out an application then at least we will have done something," said Karlin-Resnick.

EGYPT

for Antiquities, Gaballah Ali Gaballah. In addition to the restoration, workmen cleared old cars, kiosks and houses from the area, he said.

Though discovered in 1924, the 10 tombs weren't opened to the public until Tuesday. They were for judges, ministers and aides to the Pharaohs who ruled Egypt 4,573 years to 4,321 years ago.

Gaballah said the closeness of the tombs to the great pyramids reflected the relationships between their occupants and the Pharaohs.

"The king was the guarantor of the after-life," he said.

Some of them are built with columns, which gives them an appearance of small temples – a feature rarely found in tombs built later. The walls of the tombs are decorated with scenes of offerings of geese, legs of beef and fruit such as figs to the gods. In at least one tomb, there are drawings of ships. Almost none of the original paint remains on the drawings.

Gaballah and Culture Minister Farouk Hosni, who led reporters and archaeologists through some of the 10 tombs, said Tuesday's ceremony was not a part of a campaign to revive Egyptian tourism, which has been in the doldrums since Muslim extremists killed 58 tourists and four Egyptians outside the southern city of Luxor in November.

"This is part of our routine work. But if something good comes out of it for tourism, we're not going to say no," said Gaballah.

The government is now preparing an international gala event for the reopening of the restored Sphinx at the end of this month.

IRAQ

spokesman Mike McCurry said there was no doubt that "severest consequences" meant military action.

He said Annan had made clear "diplomacy may not have a second chance if Iraq backs away from this agreement."

Except for Britain, few other Security Council members share that interpretation. On Monday, speakers from China, Russia, France, Costa Rica, Brazil, Portugal, Sweden and others said the decision on using force rests with the full council alone.

Diplomatic sources, speaking on condition of anonymity, said several countries agreed to support the resolution only after receiving spoken assurances from the co-sponsors – Britain and Japan – that the document did not constitute authorization for an automatic American attack.

Before the vote, China's U.N. ambassador, Qin Huasun, said Beijing had insisted "that there must not be any automatic authorization of the use of force against in Iraq in this current resolution."

"Our misgivings about the possible abuse of this resolution have not been removed," Qin said in a clear warning to Washington. "The passing of this resolution in no way means that the Security Council automatically authorizes any state to use force against Iraq."

Russian Ambassador Sergey Lavrov said the resolution "contains nothing that would go beyond the boundaries of any of the agreements achieved by the secretary-general in Baghdad."

During Monday's debates, ambassadors from countries such as Costa Rica and Brazil, which rarely play a public role in council deliberations, sought out television cameras to argue against any blank check for an attack on Iraq.

It appeared that the Iraqis were keenly aware of the divisions within the council.

In Baghdad Tuesday, Foreign Minister Mohammed Saeed al-Sahhaf said the resolution was a mere "face-saving" measure for the United States but promised that Baghdad would not violate the agreement.

"If there is any real meaning in this resolution, then it is the adoption and the endorsement" of the agreement, al-Sahhaf told Associated Press Television. "The rest is some kind of political rhetoric."

The United States has maintained that it has sufficient authority to use force under resolutions enacted since 1991.

TECHNOLOGY

This includes identifying the building, room number, and network card or adapter I.D. name.

Schilling, who deals with students living on-campus, pointed out that a distinction is made between who owns the computer and who puts stuff on it.

For example, an outside source may be installing illegal software on someone else's web site and the owner may not be aware of this.

Schilling added that UCLA doesn't check e-mails as a monitoring mechanism, "because of the sheer number (of computer users), and students are entitled to their privacy," she said.

"Unlike other campuses, we don't capture the data (of the e-mail), but we randomly do capture the data which reflects the origination location," Schilling said.

Computer users should be aware of the agreement's violations, Schilling said.

"This is a very serious problem with potentially serious consequences," he said.

These violations may also be breaking state and federal laws, he added.

MICROSOFT

said they had not prejudged Microsoft's business practices.

One of Gates' main rivals, Netscape Communications Corp. chief executive James Barksdale, enlisted the audience's help to challenge the Microsoft founder's version of the industry.

He asked audience members to raise their hands if they had a personal computer at home or work and several dozen did. He then asked them to keep their arms up if they were among those without a Microsoft Windows operating system. Only a handful did.

"Gentlemen, that's a monopoly," Barkdale said.

Gates said the computer software industry "is working well on its own," without government interference. But he conceded that the government must police the market against "collusion or other plainly illegal activities."

"The government should be extremely wary of interceding in an industry like computer software that is working well on its own," he said.

> The Microsoft CEO provided lengthy argument against those who say his company holds a monopoly.

Hatch opened the hearing by saying, "I want to make clear at the outset that neither this hearing, nor any aspect of this committee's inquiry into these matters, are intended to serve as an arena for criticizing or attacking any single company."

Gates was joined at the witness table by two of his company's chief critics: Barksdale and Scott McNealy, chief executive of Sun Microsystems Inc. The two aren't shy about their disdain for Microsoft's business dealings.

"We think, left unchecked, Microsoft has a monopoly position that they could use to leverage their way into banking, newspapers, cable and broadcasting; Internet service providers, applications and databases browsers. You name it," McNealy said.

"When you have a monopolist in the food chain, they absolutely have Pac Man capabilities."

Gates and his rivals disagree intensely about Microsoft Corp.'s business tactics, but they are like-minded on one point: There shouldn't be new government regulations on the Internet or the software business in general.

The Microsoft CEO provided lengthy argument against those who say his company holds a monopoly. Microsoft has "just 13 percent of all operating system-level software revenues," he continued, a figure he said refers to Microsoft's share of revenues in the broad market for mainframe, server, personal computer and other operating system software. However, the Justice Department has noted that Microsoft controls 86 percent of the market in personal computer operating systems.

The Justice Department said Microsoft threatened to revoke Compaq Computer's license for Windows 95 after the PC maker tried to steer Internet surfers to Netscape Navigator instead of Microsoft's browser.

In January, Microsoft avoided a contempt-of-court citation by agreeing to let computer-makers temporarily offer its latest version of Windows 95 without easy access to its Internet Explorer software. The company is appealing a December federal court order on the browser issue.

Scores prove need for smaller class sizes

EDUCATION: Teachers cannot be expected to give each child due attention under crowded conditions

When one teacher is expected to teach a class of more than 40 students, chances are some students will get overlooked. And when students are neglected, their academic development is adversely affected. Thus, it is important for lawmakers to work on cutting down class sizes to help foster growth for the millions of students across the nation.

In the Third International Mathematics and Science Study, students from over 21 countries took a math and science test. Of the 21 participating nations, American high school seniors ranked very low. This can be partially attributed to the overcrowded conditions in classrooms, in which teachers are unable to address individual concerns or problems students may have.

With class sizes often exceeding 40 students, there is a need to decrease student-to-teacher ratios. In the past few years, school districts that have reduced their K-3 classes from over 30 down to 22 students have seen higher standardized test scores.

During the 1996-1997 school year, average test scores of low-income first-graders in Wisconsin classes with 15 students increased 12 to 14 percent more than the scores of students in regular-size classes. Scores for African American males attending small classes increased by over 40 percent more than the scores of African American males in larger ones. These impressive figures are a testament to the importance of class-size reduction and the worthiness of investing tax dollars on reducing sizes of other K-3 classes.

The Tennessee Student/Teacher Achievement Ratio program also found that children in small classes benefited academically.

The crucial stage for children is in grades K-3. During this time children are developing behavioral as well as academic skills. Throughout these years, children need constant attention and guidance in all settings, especially in the classrooms. Research has revealed that when students are neglected in the classrooms, it can have far-reaching negative consequences in their academic, social and cognitive development. This can be prevented by cutting class sizes down so that teachers can devote more of their energy and time to assisting those students who are experiencing problems in school.

Opponents of class-size reduction cite a lack of money or the unwillingness to dole out money as the problem.

In Pennsylvania, tax dollars spent on cutting class sizes equaled $8 per person to ensure that their children would be well prepared for the 21st century. This is a minor price that yields enormous results.

Education must not be placed on the back burner. Students, especially young children in grades K-3, need special attention and guidance that only can be provided in small classroom settings. One of the biggest obstacles facing education is the difficulty in securing adequate funding. In light of the recent study that revealed America's education system is lagging, it's time to re-evaluate our priorities. And it starts with the education of children. There should be no debate about providing the best for our children, whatever financial burdens might be incurred, because education is too important to be compromised.

Farmers' Market lacks charm during moratorium

FOOD: Vendors deserve chance to compete with bigger village businesses

Brent Hopkins

Hopkins can't think of a clever tagline right now.

Jell-O, again ... It's Tuesday; I guess that means it's time for Spicy Shrimp Ramen ... Shakey's again?

The eating habits of a college student can be somewhat limited at times. The dorms are convenient and eating out is easy, but sometimes, a little variety is nice. I mean, hey, how many meals of grilled cheese sandwiches and Raisin Bran can you take? For those of us who are looking for something a bit different, there's the Farmers' Market.

On Thursdays from 2 to 7 p.m., Weyburn Avenue in front of Macy's is blocked off and turned into an outdoor market, where merchants hawk their wares.

You can find just about any kind of uncommon, organically-grown fruit, from pomegranates to jack fruit; delicious habaero peppers; and popped-on-the-spot caramel corn. There's usually a cool little jazz trio creating a pleasant atmosphere, and various political interest groups asking for support for whatever their cause is.

OK, this is starting to sound like a commercial here. That's not really my intention. I come to bury the Farmers' Market, not to praise it. Just suffice it to say, it's generally the bomb. I guess it's a little expensive, compared with going to VONS, but then again, you won't find the same stuff, either.

For example, VONS definitely does not have the Juice Guy. I rarely buy his stuff, but the Juice Guy is one of the most entertaining vendors around. He says his juice has a magic ingredient in it that has aphrodisiac properties.

I used to love to browse around the little craft tables and food booths. You could find henna tattoo kits, flower jewelry and handmade clothing at the tables, and some of the most delicious food you'd ever want. Think about any imaginable dining hall meal. Now think about what you would never find on the menu.

That's what you'd find at the Farmers' Market booths. Fried plantains, horchata, Korean barbecue, homemade sausage, dirty rice – if it was good, it was there.

Well, as long as we're imagining things, I guess we'll just have to imagine that those food booths are still there. They've packed up and moved elsewhere, because of a 60-day moratorium on hot food and craft booths imposed by the Westwood Village Community Alliance.

The closest thing you can get to a decent meal now is frozen tamales. Crummy, no?

According to reports in the Daily Bruin, a possible reason why the vendors were driven out was that their sales were cutting into the business of local restaurants – Chasin' Chicken, in particular. Everyone wants to make a buck, but forcing out small vendors is not the way to do it.

In preparing this column, I talked to a friend who has worked at similar markets, and the more we discussed it, the more I realized that sending the vendors packing is definitely not a good idea. Not only does it wipe out a niche market for them, it impacts the surrounding community and businesses as well.

When you go to the market, you don't find McDonald's or Burger King, and there's a reason why. These markets are designed for the sake of small merchants, not major corporations. These aren't money-grubbers looking to squeeze more McDollars out of you; it's Mom, Dad and Uncle Chester busting it to cook up some food and then hustling around the county to all the markets they can handle so they can make a little bit of cash to make ends meet. Sure, there are some larger businesses, but most of them are small, family-owned ones.

They need this personal, direct way to sell their wares, because they don't have the major marketing dollars that the corporations do. You can look behind the counter and probably see the chef himself, stirring his pot. You can strike up a conversation, get to know the people who work there and connect with them on a much deeper level than you could with a cashier at Jack-In-The-Box. Suppose you're a little short

Generalizations about racists only widen gaps

UNDERSTANDING: Schwartz oversimplifies issue by applying fallacious stereotype to whites

By Marc Angelucci

Michael Schwartz, in his Feb. 27 article "Power and Privilege: Who's Really Got It?" makes the following argument: 1) racism is prejudice plus power; 2) whites have all the power; 3) therefore, "only whites can be racist." He then adds that "if you are white, then you are racist."

Schwartz's overly simplistic argument takes a general truth and mistakenly applies it to all cases, a fallacy sometimes called an "accident." By his reasoning, when a group of inner-city high school girls lit my friend's hair on fire and beat her in the locker room because she was white, that was not racism, because she had all the "power." When Native American nations like the Chickasaw and Choctaw enslaved African Americans, it was not racism, because the Native Americans had no power (and yet those whites who risked their lives in the Underground Railroad were all racists).

Schwartz himself is white, so he chivalrously "admits" he is racist. Of course, he does not simply mean he is susceptible to the same prejudice that all humans are. Rather, he means he is racist on account of his being white. His stereotyping of all whites as racist is ironic given that he also says whites have the privilege of being "classified as individuals."

After explaining that he benefited from affirmative action, Schwartz says: "Any white person, who upon reading this thought I was black or Latino, there's your racism." A good point, but I'll bet some minority readers thought the same thing for the exact same reasons as some whites did. Why were the whites automatically being racist but not the others? Such generalizations do not foster understanding; they only widen gaps.

By parallel reasoning, Schwartz's position is that all whites who favored Proposition 187 did so because of racism. Never mind the fact that half the African American population and close to half of Latino voters favored 187. Despite my opposition to 187, I believe the reason a surprisingly high number of minorities favored it was because they feel that illegal immigration hurts the lower class more than anyone, since they have to compete for low-cost housing, jobs and public school space. Isn't it possible that some whites favored it for the same reason, rather than because of racism?

I, like Schwartz, am a white male who benefited from socioeconomic affirmative action. In fact, my story of delinquency and expulsion is similar to his. Yet my perception of white privilege differs sharply. I was raised on the east side of Los Angeles in a family of five with one small income, an old clunker car and plenty of unmentionable hardships. My life-long Chicano friend was raised in a family of four with two good incomes, a Mammoth condo, new cars, computers, etc. And, if I didn't have Latino friends backing me up, I would not have survived the provocations I faced being blond and blue-eyed in a tough Latino neighborhood. My case may be uncommon, and being white may have given me some privileges. But Schwartz's simplistic generalizations will never convince me or my Latino friends that I was the racist one with all the power.

Power coupled with prejudice, not color, defines racism in U.S.

ACCUSATION: People of all ethnicities are biased, not just privileged whites

By Alexander Schwarz

In response to Michael Schwartz's article in the Feb. 27 Daily Bruin titled, "Power and Privilege: Who's Really Got It?" I must say that you, Schwartz, do not make a convincing case. Your logic is not sound, nor is your definition of racism accurate.

You assume that "If you are white, you are racist." Your logic comes from the following argument: Racism is prejudice with power, and only white people have power; therefore, if you are a white person, you are racist. The fallacy here lies in who has power. You claim only white people have power, based on the fact that 98.6 percent of top-level jobs belong to those with white skin. Though I don't believe that jobs are the only indicator of power in our society, I will follow through with the assumption that they do, and white people do in fact have 98.6 percent of the power. Suppose I am generous and grant that this group of elite job holders represents 20 percent of the white population. What is the relationship between these elites and the remaining 80 percent of the white population? The extension of your argument is that the elite 20 percent is racist toward the remaining 80 percent. But if that is the case, your argument has nothing to do with skin color. Permit me to amend your argument: Racism is prejudice with power; some white people have power; therefore, some white people are racist. Yes, unfortunately, some white people are racist, but so are some African American people, Latino people, Asian American people and anyone else in this world. I don't think anyone needed your article to tell us that.

I looked up the word racism in the dictionary (American Heritage) to see if the definition matched that given in your article, and I found that it didn't. What I found was this: "The notion that one's own ethnic stock is superior." Using this definition, I can think of someone I know belonging to any ethnicity who has made a comment implying that their ethnicity is superior. I'll assume, then, that there are racist people of all colors, ethnicities and creeds. To single one group out, such as you did, is unfair and shows extraordinary bias; that you are a part of that group makes no difference.

I would never dare to argue that racism is not a problem in America. I don't think it is the biggest problem in America though; I think prejudice is. Prejudice is "a preconceived preference or idea." Everyone on earth shows some degree of prejudice, whether against white, black, tall, short, thin, fat, rich, poor, ugly or beautiful persons. If these prejudices didn't exist, then we could all see those who are truly racist for what they are: sad, misinformed and hateful individuals.

I suggest, Schwartz, that instead of acting on your own prejudices against people with white skin and accusing all white-skinned people of being racist, you evaluate your own beliefs and work toward making yourself a better individual, free of prejudice.

In response to statements made about the prejudices, laws and discrimination non-whites face, I agree that anyone offended – black, white or whatever – should stand up for those on the short end of that stick. I do urge you and everyone else not to assume that all white-skinned people act on or believe in such discriminatory practices.

At least one white-skinned person doesn't.

Schwarz is a fourth-year geography student.

Troubling headline ignores women

Jo Anne Beazley
Graduate School of Education and Information Studies

I was disappointed with the sexist word choice for the Daily Bruin's front-page headline on Feb. 26, "Albert Carnesale searching for a No. 2 man." Shame on the editing staff of The Bruin, who should have known better than to use sexist language that ignores women.

Research in the psychology of language has consistently shown that people do not, in fact, interpret masculine forms as generic terms equally including or referring to both men and women. Does the job description for the executive vice chancellor require that a man fulfill this position? Biased language use has no place at a university, or anywhere else for that matter. I expect better from The Bruin.

Word choice reeks of sexism

Anthony Danna
Fourth-year Sociology

I am bothered by the headline you chose to accompany the story about the search for the executive vice chancellor ("Albert Carnesale searching for a No. 2 man," Feb. 26). I am sure it was not your intent to suggest the search committee will be looking for a man, but the headline reeked of sexism. Must we still use phrases like "right-hand man," "No. 2 man" or "the best man for the job"? I would hope an enlightened establishment like the Daily Bruin could move beyond the colloquialisms of yesterday.

Lavin largely to blame for team woes

BASKETBALL: National title hopes melt away under faulty leadership

By T. Richard Davis

A year and a half ago, the UCLA men's basketball program was at a crossroads. With head coach Jim Harrick fired for covering up a "recruiting" dinner involving two of his players, a young, inexperienced assistant coach was hired just days before the season opener.

Steve Lavin coached, or organized, a team that was as highly regarded in the country as any and was many critics' choice to win a second national championship in three seasons. With potential All-Americans in Toby Bailey, Kris Johnson, J.R. Henderson and Jelani McCoy, the UCLA basketball team was very potent. But with a rookie coach, could this team refocus and succeed?

Davis can be reached for comment at bruin@sinosa.com.

Following an "Elite Eight" appearance in the NCAA tournament in the Midwest Finals in San Antonio, Texas, Lavin was deemed a success and awarded a long-term extension of his head coach contract.

All's well that ends well, and Westwood is again a national power, right? Well, yes, but not exactly. Let's review the season, and not just the incredible run at the end of a weak Pac-10 field, for the 1996-1997 season.

Opening the season, UCLA played in the National Invitational Tournament and lost in the first round. It was an overtime loss of 77-76 to unranked Tulsa. A big loss to a not-so-big team. Remember? The lineup included Charles O'Bannon, Henderson, McCoy, Bailey, Cameron Dollar and Johnson. A lineup that looks similar, but much different than this year's team.

A month later, UCLA, now ranked No. 24, played its very first road game of the season. (Wait a minute – did I miss something? Ranked No. 5 going into the season, played all of their first month at home, and the Bruins went all the way down to No. 24 ... impressive. That game was not even a "home" game for opponent Illinois; the game was played in Chicago. It was another Bruin loss – even larger, at 79-63. Big spread, but that wasn't the most significant statistic; it was the shooting percentages. One team shot 46 percent from the floor and the other shot 40 percent. What makes the stat crucial to this letter is that UCLA shot the 46 percent, not Illinois. The Bruins clearly out-shot Illinois, and still lost by 16! Great coaching?

And then we go to the biggest rival in the conference, the University of Arizona. This would be the first matchup of the season, and the tables had turned. Arizona was ranked No. 6, and UCLA was unranked. I repeat, it was Jan. 18, 1996, and UCLA was unranked. The game went to overtime, and UCLA held on to win 84-78. That was close, but should it have been that close? Looking at the key on cash or don't have the right change; that's sometimes not a big deal. I've seen vendors let a little slide, saying, "Hey, pay me next week." Even if I've got to pay a little more for the food, I'll go to places like the market, since the people who work there are genuine, real folks, not carbon-copy corporation employees.

If I were a restaurant owner, and my business dipped a bit on Thursdays, sure, I'd be a little put off. That doesn't mean that all the businesses should be eradicated, though. Chasin' Chicken is there seven days a week, from 11 a.m. to 11 p.m., not just five hours on one weekday afternoon. That works out to be 84 hours a week, or more than 16 times the amount of time the vendors' stands were open. I find it hard to believe that the vendors snare that much business in their small amount of operating time. Presumably, Chasin' Chicken loses business to other local restaurants, too, but that doesn't mean that In-N-Out, Subway or any other place that might impinge upon Chasin' Chicken's business has to move.

The food at the market was unique, too. You can find a lot of restaurants in Westwood, but you couldn't find homemade jambalaya unless the Farmers' Market had it. Most markets prohibit resale of manufactured food and require vendors to prepare their cuisine themselves. You aren't paying for something out of a can; you're paying for something that was put together by hand. This is not to say that the food at the local restaurants is somehow bad or artificial, but rather that the things you could find at the market were something different.

It might seem like a convenient fix to remove the booths, thus sending customers back to the restaurants, but it's not quite that simple. For many UCLA students, the main reason for going to the market was not to stock up on fruit and vegetables, but for the atmosphere. It's still a neat place to go and walk around, but there aren't so many things to see, and unless you want to eat free samples and fruit, you can't grab a bite to eat, either. There is now less incentive to go.

As you can probably tell from my terrible photo up there, as well as the oddball points of view I've expressed thus far, I'm not a typical guy. Let's forget that, however, and use me as the model of a normal UCLA dorm resident. Back before they jacked it up, I'd go into the market and wander around. I'd look at the produce for sale, talk to the Juice Guy and browse the crafts a bit.

I'd head down to the food area, and maybe get an ice-cold cup of horchata and savor that nice cinnamon taste for a while. Horchata still in hand, I'd make my way to the Cajun booth and buy an order of fried plantains. My hunger pang satisfied, I would wander back toward the main area and saunter around a bit more. I like jazz, so if I had some spare cash, maybe I'd toss some the way of the band. Usually, I wouldn't feel like heading back to the dorms, so I'd screw around in Westwood for a bit, poking my head into stores and checking them out.

I'm not as inclined to do so anymore, though. Sure, there is still the popcorn and the band, but there is not quite as pleasant an atmosphere anymore. By taking away the food stalls, the food vendors aren't the only ones that suffer. The band loses money, the political guys don't get their precious signatures, the produce farmers lose customers and local merchants get less business as well.

I'm not hopeless. The moratorium may be lifted, and the market may return to its former splendor.

Hopefully, the Westwood Village Community Alliance will realize that the expulsion of the vendors is not a solution, but another problem. If not, oh well – there's always the Juice Guy.

DAVIS

numbers shows this shouldn't have been close at all.

Advantages: UCLA's shooting percentage was 46 percent to Arizona's 40 percent; free throw percentage: UCLA, 72 percent to 60 percent; rebounding: UCLA, 44 to 35; no one from UCLA fouled out; three Wildcats fouled out.

So answer me this question: Why did we lose the game? If it wasn't the players and it wasn't the arena, what is left? Coaching!

The second game against Arizona was more of the same. UCLA won down the wire, 66-64, on a shot by Henderson. However, this game had an even larger margin of shooting percentages: UCLA shot 59 percent and Arizona shot 40 percent. We barely won again. What is keeping this team down? Coaching!

By the way, the week before the Arizona and Arizona State trip, the Bruins had moved back into the top 25, again ranked No. 24.

Moving a couple weeks ahead into March, it would be Lavin's first tournament as head coach. After two strong offensive showings against Charleston Southern and Xavier (Ohio), UCLA would face off against relatively unknown Iowa State. In this game, the Bruins appeared unprepared as they scored a season-low 25 points in the first half. To end the game, Dollar made a running lay-up with 1.9 seconds to go, to save the victory run of UCLA. This play was reminiscent of Tyus Edney's shot against Missouri in the '95 championships. But this one would not have as happy an ending.

After leading 33-28 at halftime against Minnesota, the Bruins gave up an incredible 52 points in the second half, losing 80-72 in San Antonio. Following the game, Lavin was praised for his coaching abilities, and UCLA extended his contract soon after for some very large dollars. But the Bruins lacked then what they lack now: size.

In the game against the Badgers, McCoy left in the first half with a bruised sternum, and the game was lost from there. McCoy was the only player on the team with great size. Only Henderson even measured 6 feet 8 inches tall, and that's not enough. Lavin should know that – every other coach does.

When Johnson and McCoy returned in late December, the players received a "full reinstatement" by the team and Lavin. My contention is that Lavin's commitment to the team and the program was nothing less than two-faced. If a coach makes a statement that things are going back to the way they were, then make it so. In his 2 and 1/2 seasons at UCLA, McCoy started almost 50 games. As a freshman, he was a starter, and as a sophomore, he was a starter. But after being "fully reinstated" as a junior, he was not a starter. OK, let him work back into the lineup for a couple of days, or maybe a week. Nearly two months passed after reinstatement and Lavin still did not insert McCoy back into the starting lineup! McCoy was dominant inside, and Lavin looked the other way in favor of a much smaller three-guard lineup that included two freshmen in the backcourt. And when Bailey did not start against Duke on Feb. 22, three freshmen started.

We had a chance to win the championship this season, but not now. Not under Lavin. I had an opportunity to speak with Lavin following a close call against Arizona State in mid-January. It was the first time I had spoken to him since San Antonio last March. I told him that San Antonio was much more pleasant in April. His response was, "I hope we can get there." Nothing more about players or about upcoming opponents. Just a hope from a man who has no clue what it takes to win.

Young conductor performs works with renowned concert pianist

MUSIC: L.A. Philharmonic provides fantastic show, debuts of Levin, Harding

By Al Goldsmith
Daily Bruin contributor

Last Friday, the Los Angeles Philharmonic gave an energetic performance, featuring 22-year-old British conductor Daniel Harding and renowned Mozart specialist Robert Levin. The performance, which featured works by Bruckner, Mozart and Bartok, marked Harding and Levin's debut at the Music Center.

This was also the Los Angeles Philharmonic's first performance of Bruckner's String Quintet in F major in a version for string orchestra. This unusual performance of the quintet gave the piece a rich, full sound, perhaps bigger and better than when played one per part. After hearing this performance, one may never be satisfied with the quintet when played as written. Since the string orchestra version magnifies the sound and makes the music more dramatic, the symphonic quality of the piece begins to emerge.

Following Bruckner's String Quintet in F major, Robert Levin performed the Piano Concerto No. 27 by Mozart. Although feelings of hopelessness and resignation reverberate throughout the piece, Levin's energetic performance brought out the beauty and delight of Mozart's work. True to his fame for improvisation, Levin's improvised cadenza was impressive and captured the Mozartian spirit.

Levin's much-applauded performance by no means stole the spotlight. Harding's expressive conducting left the audience in awe.

Harding, who became the principal conductor of the Trondheim Symphony Orchestra this season, has already built a name for himself as an accomplished conductor. His conducting, characterized by sweeping, graceful motion, is amazingly polished.

But while Harding's conducting was wonderfully sensitive and expressive, at times it seemed too grandiose, especially during the slow, quiet movements within the Bruckner Quintet. During these movements, Harding's romantic, rather than military, style of conducting overwhelmed the mood of the piece and the size of the ensemble. This made Harding appear as if he were following the music in his mind rather than what the ensemble played.

It was not until the Mozart Piano Concerto or Bartok's The Miraculous Mandarin that his conducting truly suited the music. Since Harding's conducting seems to suit large, symphonic works, one looks forward to seeing him conduct large-scale symphonies by composers such as Brahms and Beethoven.

The evening, which began peace-

UCLA tackles family tragedy, birth of universe in productions of "Les Cenci" and "Origen"

By Sam Toussi
Daily Bruin Contributor

Two plays to be performed at the Little Theater in Macgowan Hall in repertory will offer a multinational effect. Whereas "Les Cenci" offers French talent alongside UCLA talent, "Origen" meshes many cultures in search of something new.

"Les Cenci" is a play based on the historical account of Count Cenci, a cold and cruel Roman nobleman who killed his sons and raped his daughters. The sons he did not kill went on to plan an assassination of their violent father.

"It's a revelation of violence and family, a microcosm of our society," says director Rene Migliaccio. "It seems that the cycle of violence has no real end."

Written by poet and playwright Antonin Artaud in the 1930s, the play is based Percy Shelley's interpretation of the events.

"Artaud considered himself more of a poet than his plays changed the way we look at plays today," Migliaccio says. "His work was very avant-garde."

The play is a collaborative process between UCLA, University of Paris 8 and University of Paris 3. Migliaccio, a French professional director, has taken the helm of this play and brought his unique style of theater to UCLA's own Little Theater.

"It's very movement-oriented," Migliaccio says. "All my plays are done this way. The movements of the actors are meant to reveal their thoughts and emotions beyond the words they say on stage."

Migliaccio's style of direction is extremely challenging for any actor, but Migliaccio is pleased with how well the students have taken to his style.

"They are very talented," Migliaccio says. "The whole process has been very simple."

"Origen," a play conceived by Ruben Polendo, attempts to establish a new myth. The new story takes elements from multiple cultures around the world.

"It's something new," Polendo says. "We did all this research in other cultures and we found all sorts of things that relate to who we are now."

Polendo, who hesitates to say he wrote "Origen," prefers to say he conceived the project. Together with dramaturge Campbell Britton, as well as his cast, Polendo used the collaborative process to compose the bulk of the play.

"It was the idea of creating a myth and we researched on this and ideologies from around the world," Polendo says. "The project comes from an idea of mine that we're lost ourselves of God and of mythology and every myth we encounter is so ancient and so far removed. That's what drew me to the project."

The collaborative process drew the actors to the project and allowed them to experience a more personal approach to theater.

"It's certainly a different process from any other show I've worked on," says cast member Piper Harrell. "With mainstage shows, you get more money, your design becomes immense, but you also get this hype that's hard to live up to. There's not as much hype here so you can concentrate on what matters more. It was definitely more personal, it's hard to qualify it with other shows."

The close personal nature of the play as well as its process led the cast to grow close during rehearsal.

Cast member Arrion Doss adds, "We've definitely become a family during rehearsal."

The closeness the cast experienced did much to help each member grow as an actor.

"Working on this show, I've really learned to listen," Harrell says. "It's such a small cast that if you don't start listening and knowing that you're going

Director contemplates aging in newest work

FILM: Robert Benton explores difficulties of characters entering twilight of their lives

By Lonnie Harris
Daily Bruin Contributor

Celebrities seem to age gracefully, at least more than the average person. When most Americans are beginning to lose their hair, stoop when they walk and become fitted for that first pair of dentures, the average Hollywood starlet is still trying out thong bikinis.

Such is the cast of "Twilight," a noir-ish thriller about the perils and intrigue which ensue when the beautiful people get older and can't get by on looks alone any more. "Twilight" features such senior celebrities as Paul Newman, Gene Hackman and James Garner. The film centers around a Hollywood couple (Hackman and Susan Sarandon) whose mysterious past comes back to haunt them just as one of them is diagnosed with cancer.

To aid him in covering up this past tragedy, Hackman hires his best friend/personal private detective Paul Newman, and all sorts of film noir style shenanigans ensue.

The film's writer/director, Robert Benton, an older man who, like the characters in his movies, seems comfortable with his years, tries to explain to a room full of young reporters just what "Twilight" says about aging and maintaining one's dignity.

Benton opts to use this simple detective story to explore how people deal with the trauma of watching their youth fade away, as well as explore how wisdom, especially about love, increases with age.

"I wanted to write a film about how complicated love is," Benton says. "That is one of the things I've become aware of over the years, especially the last few years. Love is extremely complicated, and in some cases a really dangerous activity."

In order to express these ideas through decidedly unsympathetic characters, Benton needed some creative casting. He hired Newman and Hackman, both of whom he'd worked with previously in "Nobody's Fool."

"What I like about Paul is that he has a tremendous sense of sympathy," Benton says. "What started with 'Bonnie and Clyde' and continues right through to 'Twilight' is that there are people in these pictures who blackmail and do all sorts of bad things, but I sympathize with them."

Benton feels that Newman is very much in touch with his directorial style. Benton prefers to work in conjunction with his actors, discussing scenes and getting input before shooting them, an approach he feels makes the work both more personal and more intuitive. This style, though helpful for Benton in showing the deeper subtext of his films, is not adopted by all directors.

"I'm a pushover," Benton says. "I'm not a mean son of a bitch. I work with the people that I like. I'm very careful to hire people that I like, and I do my best to listen. I'm not a dictator. Directors like James Cameron, and I don't know him, but I hear that he's a dictator.

"Believe me, it works being a dictator," Benton continues. "Making a movie is like building a house. Let's say you're laying the foundation, and there's a well in the way. What do you do? Directors like James Cameron blow it up. John Ford blows it up. Victor Fleming blows it up. Or, you build around it. Some directors treat what happens as part of the film. That's what I do."

> Benton comes to terms with getting older ... by creating characters who are trying to ease into their golden years.

Benton has applied his signature directorial style to such films as "Billy Bathgate," "Bad Company," "Kramer vs. Kramer" and "Nobody's Fool," but he primarily considers himself a writer. After receiving criticism for "Billy Bathgate," one of the few films he directed which was not self-scripted, Benton decided that he would no longer direct films which he hadn't penned himself.

With "Twilight," Benton comes to terms with getting older himself by creating characters who are trying to ease into their golden years. As with his previous works, Benton writes films based on what's going on in his personal life.

"Some screenplays are paid jobs. In that case you use whatever sense of craft you have to tell a good story," Benton explains. "I put those films outside of my general body of work. Some of my films, like 'Bonnie and Clyde' and 'Bad Company,' were things that I cared about. Those pictures have a tone that came out of my experiences.

"My movies, including 'Twilight' have really been governed by the interests that I have at the time," he continues. "When I was 20, I was looking for answers. Now I realize I'm looking at a mystery that I will never solve. That mystery seems so beautiful and so inexhaustible that it's worth studying."

FILM: "Twilight" opens Friday.

Young Bleed, " 'All I Have In This World, Are ...' My Balls and My Word" (No Limit/Priority) Remember when everybody and their mama was doin' commercials for St. Ides? The beats and rhymes were so tight, but the commercials were so short that they literally had you thirsting for more. Such snippets of excellence come to mind when hearing "An Offer U Can't Refuse," a minute-long teaser on the new album "My Balls and My Word" by Young Bleed.

Young Bleed? Who? Or better yet, what? But, don't let the name fool you. "My Balls and My Word" is a 14-track opus that starts off slammin' and only gets better! Hailing from Baton Rouge, LA, Young Bleed is the latest member from Master P's No Limit posse to show and prove that the "Dirty South" is most definitely "Bout it, Bout it."

Young Bleed's flow is so mellow that he'll make your head nod even a capella. He weaves stories of hustling in the streets; unlike other so-called "gangsta rappers" he does so sans the gratuitous violence and with virtually no misogyny. Young Bleed poignantly spins tales about the frustration growing up poor in the ghetto and the challenges and "opportunities" this reality presents.

The beats on "My Balls and My Word" are reminiscent of some southernplayeristic Cadillac funk, complete with heavy basslines and bluesy guitar rifts. At times the beats sound sinister, but that eeriness is awfully seductive. While the beats aren't really "shake ya booty" type of beats, they are funky enough to boogie to just a little. Regardless of what flavor of hip-hop you prefer, if you like tight beats and phat rhymes "My Balls and My Word" is where its at. J. Jioni Palmer B+

Sneaker Pimps, "Becoming Remixed" (Virgin) The Sneaker Pimps, named quite cool-ly after a Beastie Boys reference, caused quite a stir with their debut album, "Becoming X," which sold a few hundred thousand records or so. Thanks to their from-KROQ-to-Star-98.7 hit, "6 Underground" and a remixed version of "Spin Spin Sugar," the Sneaker Pimps' hypnotic sounds have reached a big audience, bigger than more stylish trip-hop acts like Portishead and Tricky.

So, maybe "Becoming Remixed" was inevitable. Pressed in limited numbers, this 10-track disc features all the remixes for the Sneaker Pimps' best songs. As a matter of fact, on occasion there is more than one remix for certain songs.

"6 Underground" is represented twice, both ending up quite marginal. "Spin Spin Sugar" also has two manifestations on the album, with "Armand's Dark Garage Mix" being a little too much on the disco/house tip and "Armand's Bonus Dub" sounding slightly the same but more repetitive. This is disappointing also because neither version is like the remix KROQ and other alt-radio stations played. There are also three editions of "Post-Modern Sleaze," including one remixed by Reprazent (of Roni Size fame).

Sadly, the only true standout is the "Americruser Mix" of "Tesko Suicide," an aggressive and percussion-heavy remix. Remix albums by nature aren't usually that great, and "Becoming Remixed" is no exception, especially when compared to the laid-back magic of the Sneaker Pimps' regular trip-hop form. Unless you're a diehard Sneaker Pimps fan (and hurry, because there's a limited amount of "Becoming Remixed" discs being made), maybe it's wise to stick to the originals. Mike Prevatt B-

Miles Davis, "Panthalassa: The Music of Miles Davis 1969-1974" (Columbia) Trippy jazz extraordinaire Miles Davis blows minds all over again with his funky release, "Panthalassa." The album, which includes newly restored material and previously unheard extended themes, comes as the brainchild of producer Bill Laswell in the form of a modern mix translation. However, the electric, early '70s jam sessions play as pure as any Davis recordings already available. The piece includes Indian-influenced bongo drum meanderings as well as Davis's reverberating trumpet work, creating a multi-textural style unique to the world of Davis's own head.

The pieces tend to flow spiritually through a series of jazz-inspired solos that bridge the '70s world of guitar-heavy, wide sounding radio rock with the more introspective realm of fine lounge music. Yet, the continually warping melodies never seem directionless or unmotivated, always managing to reel the listener into the current thematic galaxy being explored. The crispness of the versions included on the remixed compact disc far surpass that of worn-out records containing earlier Davis conceptualizations. If nothing else, "Panthalassa" recalls the days when the creation of music was as much of an art form as the music itself. One can practically feel the energy which went into the recording of the musical efforts, though the sounds stem from an era just recently terminated. Vanessa VanderZanden. A

Gov't Mule, "Dose" (Capricorn) The hard-rock scene remains pretty well hidden in a genre full of alternative mainstream, but bands like Gov't Mule manage to keep dishing out exciting compilations of old and new favorites. In their new album, "Dose," Gov't Mule (a band with Allman Brothers blood in it) combines blues and Southern-style rock with riveting guitar chords and powerful drives.

The album is a great mix of soulful vocals, frenzied guitar solos and thoughtful instrumentals. Each song stands unique from the others. The Butthole Surfers-type vocals of "Blind Man in the Dark" stand out as incomprehensible electronic static while those from the cover of Son House classic "John the Revelator" remain both inspirational and melodic. Undertones in "Raven, Black Night" cast intriguing quirks of guitar and bass while in contrast the deep, hearty southern style of "I Shall Return" remains simple and straightforward.

The whole album provides the workings of a hit for those tired of immature rhythms. Interestingly enough, the songs are the result of complex composing. A song will start off as a careful jazzy mix of guitar picking and mellow bass. In an instant, however, the songs turns into a rampage of mixed scratchy guitar chords and wild drum beats. Gov't Mule pulls off interesting covers (listen to their unique take on the Beatles' "She Said, She Said") and great hard-rockin' hits. Michelle Zubiate A-

Play examines our fascination with pain

THEATER: Disturbing story dramatizes playwright Strindberg's tortured themes

By Sam Toussi
Daily Bruin Contributor

It seems that as a society we've become really sadistic. T.V. shows such as "South Park" are great, but take a step back and acknowledge the fact that the jokes are cruel and some of the visuals are really disturbing. What's really disturbing though, is that we all find it funny. Somehow, at some time, other people's pain became funny. "Play Strindberg (without tears)" is a play that seeks to capitalize on our sick amusement with other people's torture.

The title refers to the eternally tortured but revered Swedish playwright August Strindberg and the play takes its cues from the themes found in his work "Dance of Death." The "(without tears)" part of the title lets the audience know that this pain will be funny. Yet while the play proposes to be a comedy, you'd have to be sadistic to find half the humor remotely humorous. You would have to find an old man who is very sick a laugh riot.

Set on a remote Swedish island, we'll presume, during Strindberg's lifetime, (again we'll presume), the play revolves around a husband and wife who hate each other with a passion, the husband being an officer (Jack Heller), and the wife an actress of no talent (Salome Jens). The officer is due to die any second, and it doesn't ruin the play to tell you that he dies in the end; the whole play seems to be a death scene. The couple is visited by Kurt (Richard Neil) whom their officer blames for the couple's marriage. The play turns into a battle between the three characters to see which one will leave the stage alive and a winner.

Directed by Martin Magner, the play is set up as a boxing match between three boxers and each scene is a "round." Magner is a very experienced director and his talent comes through. There are no flaws in his direction and the timing between the actors is on cue for the most part.

The actors are gifted and well placed in their roles. Heller takes a glee in the physical pain he endures and the mental pain he inflicts on his wife. He plays that glee to perfection but he is such a lush it is hard to sympathize with him. Add that to the fact that he mentally abuses a woman and suddenly, you want him to die.

Jens shows a great deal of depth as the wife who tolerates her husband's abuse only when he is watching. As soon as he

ART: UCLA professor brings 18th-century costumes to life for kids

By Emi Kojima
Daily Bruin Contributor

A delicate eight-year-old girl in her chemise stood before the lecture hall on a black box, smiling and biting her bottom lip.

Enter Michael Hackett, UCLA professor of theater. Using the girl and her fictional brother as props for his lecture for adults and children alike, Hackett began to speak.

This lecture, which took place on Feb. 28 and described 1740s children's costuming was part of the second family festival day held at the J. Paul Getty Center in order to promote family trips to the museum.

The Getty has been holding a series of these family festivals, which will continue throughout this year. A number of events, workshops and performances are scheduled so that both young and old may enjoy the Getty.

"It's exciting to have so many boys and girls in the audience," Hackett said. "The Getty tries to commit to have all sorts of people at the museum."

The theme of the most recent festival was masks. Children could create their own masks and puppets. Similarly, in the performance, the children being dressed were preparing for a masquerade ball.

Hackett described each piece of clothing and its function in detail, while attendants dressed first the girl, Erica Sandborn, and then her brother, Darren Ishmael, a UCLA third-year theater student.

They played the roles of children of a wealthy landowner or someone working in the government of King Louis XV.

"She must feel like we're torturing her," said Hackett, smiling at the

All congruent premises are not necessarily equal sitcoms

TV: Similar shows add up to different laugh levels for competing networks

By Frazier Moore
The Associated Press

Maybe pizza makes the difference.

In any case, next week marks the arrival of two sitcoms that share a nearly identical premise. And no matter how you slice it, one is funny. One isn't.

"Two Guys, a Girl and a Pizza Place," the funny one, launches next Wednesday on ABC at 9:30 p.m. "House Rules," more aptly named "Two Guys, a Girl and No Pizza Place," bows Monday on NBC at 8:30 p.m.

Catch both these premieres and you'll be reminded that sitcoms, aiming to cultivate rapport with the viewer, generally avoid new, unfamiliar ideas. Another thing: The success of a sitcom depends almost all on execution. That certainly makes the difference here.

In each series, three pals face the world together as young adults. One chap is a lanky slacker-dreamer. The other is a wired-up realist. Both strenuously reject adulthood. (Did we mention Peter Pan? One of the "Two Guys" is even named Pete!) They live in close proximity, but platonically, with the gal.

NBC describes "House Rules" as "a trio of tight childhood friends who, now in their mid-20s, share a house and a life together in Denver." It stars David Newsom as a bumbling medical student, Bradley White as a reporter and Maria Pitillo as an assistant district attorney whose housemates engage in this sort of dialogue:

"I hate rats! Do you know that there are some super rats that can weigh over nine pounds?"

"Do you know that there are some supermodels that weigh under nine pounds?"

"Two Guys, a Girl and a Pizza Place" puts the pieces of the same puzzle together much more artfully. And with more humor:

"Believe me, there's 'a one.' And when you find her, you'll know."

"How will I know?"

"I'll tell you!"

> "Two Guys, a Girl and a Pizza Place" puts the pieces of the same puzzle together much more artfully.

The guys are graduate students who share an apartment in Boston. Berg (played by Ryan Reynolds) is a philosophy major with an easy-does-it outlook, who makes extra money by signing up for medical experiments. Richard Ruccolo is Pete, a perpetually fretful would-be architect.

"Pete's my home base," says Berg, explaining their relationship. "I wouldn't get to be me if he wasn't him."

The girl is Sharon, their former college bud and now their upstairs neighbor who mothers them with a wide-screen TV and a well-stocked refrigerator. Played by Traylor Howard, she is a comically irascible minx who earns a big salary selling toxic chemicals. She hates herself for that almost as much as she loves her BMW.

The fellows work part time at a pizzeria, where a patron steals scenes with his droll dementia: "Somehow I found myself in Morocco, running a nightclub," coos the film-befuddled Mr. Bauer (David Ogden Stiers).

All in all, "Two Guys" is about as funny as you could hope for, considering the absence of a single new idea.

In each show, the fellows do their part to derail their gal pal's budding romance. But to reiterate, one version is funny; the other isn't.

If you were to take the basic "House"/"Guys" formula, then add another male and a dozen years to everyone's age, you'd have "Seinfeld" ("Three Guys, a Girl and an Upper West Side Diner"). But Jerry and his geezer chums are old news. Right now, television is consumed with that demographic anxiously poised on the precipice between college graduation and "Melrose Place."

to gain from what they have to contribute, the beauty and talent they bring, you're going to find that you've stopped growing."

Though the idea of creation-theater is not a new one, Polendo and the cast of "Origen" have combined their multi-cultural research with pervading societal situations.

"It's based on our conceptions of creation and gods and what it means to be human," Polendo says.

"Since we live in this society that is so speed-driven, we never really get a chance to stop and think about these things. The production is based on that speed, though, because everybody's so used to that overstimulation. I'm not going to fight that, I'll use it."

THEATER: "Origen" will play March 3,6,7,11,12,14. "Les Cenci" will play March 4,5,7,10,13,14. The plays will be performed at the Little Theater at Macgowan Hall. Tickets are $15, $10 for senior citizens and $7 for students. Call (310) 825-2101 for more information.

GETTY

audience made up of some of Sandborn's peers as well as professors from UCLA who are well-versed in costuming.

"That's okay, you can just have us all beheaded," Hackett joked to motley listeners.

"But actually a good middle-class girl wouldn't have that power," Hackett said to clarify the joke, "(although) a princess might."

Hackett let young audience members in the front row feel the corset piece of Sandborn's costume in order to give them an idea of what children's everyday clothes would have felt like.

Sandborn described the experience of wearing a get-up that would make even Scarlet O'Hara cringe.

"The clothes are really tight and uncomfortable," Sandborn said.

As Sandborn was covered with two more layers of an underskirt and petticoat, the audience saw a transformed girl who could have stepped out of the 18th century.

Next Hackett dressed her teenage brother, played by Ishmael.

Ishmael emerged in undergarments of the period with his short red hair appearing longer as it was tied back in a ribbon.

Hackett continuously focused on audience interaction with the children, and even called for their participation.

"Will you be my model?" Hackett asked one of Sandborn's friends with blond hair in a ponytail, to demonstrate the style of men's hair of the day.

"You look so worried," Hackett commented to the girl, who shifted from foot to foot. When she sat down, however, she grinned widely, relieved of her duty as a model.

Soon, Hackett's assistants, three of his first-year theater students, had dressed Ishmael in a two-piece suit and matching vest.

As part of the unique event, Ishmael recalled his rare "performance" at the Getty as memorable.

"The best thing that we do is to walk through the period galleries with our costumes on," Ishmael said. "We had a tour of the (French decorative room). We were told this may possibly be the bed you would have had, and it's like, wow."

When the two participants were dressed, they promenaded for the audience, fully transformed into 18th century French children in all their finery. Children and their parents were equally fascinated by the change.

Hackett showed slides of paintings in the Getty of what of what possible parents of the two children would look like. As part of the effort to make the museum exciting for children, he challenged children to find paintings of the portraits of Magdaleine Pinceloup de la Grange and her husband, Charles-Francois Pinceloup de la Grange.

The costumes for the children were based on these paintings by Jean-Baptiste Perronneau and others he did of children during the period.

Roslyn Moore, a UCLA graduate with an MFA in costuming, designed the costumes.

While Sandborn showed her initial nervousness during Saturday's show, after it was all over she ran into the audience to chat with a gaggle of little girls who had come to the show as part of her ninth birthday party.

They squealed and laughed as a photographer took pictures of the casually dressed up 1990s children with their stand-out eighteenth-century friend.

STRINGBERG

turns his back, she flies off the handle and it's liberating to see her do so, but the fact remains that she is imploring her husband to die.

The character that becomes most detestable is that of Kurt. He inflicts damage on both and becomes the villain for it. Neil portrays the character well and for a while he is the voice of reason until he starts to uncover his character slowly. Neil reveals these awful layers in his character deftly, but is all the more unlikable for it.

This isn't to say that characters need to be likable. Some of the greatest characters are severely flawed. Yet there needs to be some semblance of a heart or a soul. In "South Park," every character evokes some sympathy at one time and to top it off, it's a very superficial cartoon.

On stage, the characters in "Play Strindberg (without tears)" are very real and tortured. Somehow, sadism doesn't seem as funny up close.

THEATER: "Play Strindberg (without tears)" runs through April 4 at the Marilyn Monroe Theatre, 7936 Santa Monica Blvd. Tickets are $15, $12 for students and seniors. Call (213) 660-TKTS for more information.

fully with Bruckner, ended dramatically with a suite from Bartok's ballet, The Miraculous Mandarin. Based on Ménynert Lengyel's story "A csodalatos mandarin" (The Miraculous Mandarin), a "pantomime grotesque," as he called it, the music illustrates a story about the will to live, fulfillment of desire and death.

This piece, formed by an imagination affected by war, premiered in 1926 in Cologne, Germany. Although the original performance was greeted with moral outrage, the performance by the Los Angeles Philharmonic closed with a standing ovation.

Life of the Party!

Party on Ralph!
Actually the party now IS on Ralph!
Thanks for the memories Ralph!
MOST UCLA students drink no more than 4 when they party. So what?
So, students who drink 4 or less have better love lives, are happier with their relationships, and don't become the "Life of the Party".

Now this is fun! Ralph here was demonstrating his uncanny ability to make a total ass of himself. Sure he was fun for awhile. The "Life of the Party"- but then Ralph started pounding down the brewskis like a bone dry sea sponge. It was down the hatch and damn the torpedoes! Ralph had a one way ticket to partyland, and by jove he was going to live a little. He babbled on and on about some guy named Dick, who had a good head and loved to socialize. This Dick had heard that the party line was long, but if he could adhere to the dress code he could flutter about disguised as a social butterfly. He'd fight class struggle world wide and hold the partying back until spring break, [when he would party hardy, w/thout vending down bottoms up in the student union!] When Ralph finally did shut up (actually he finally passed out, thank God) he once again became the life of the party. He helped a literature major polish up on her prose with a pretty permanent pen. When Ralph didn't quite make it to the little boy's room, a photojournalism student was there to bravely capture his little accident; and a pre-med princess got a chance to try out her new "won't rub off" lipstick on Ralph! What a chump. Hey Ralph! Most UCLA students drink four or less when they party. Some don't drink at all. Ralph drinks too much. He should drink less. He should talk less too. He should bathe more too! Not to mention his breath. It's your life, so party on Ralph! Just remember: When you've done 4 you're done.

UTLEY

The one thing that prevents scouts from giving Utley an unanimous seal of approval as a future major league shortstop is his defense. Utley has committed 15 errors in only 18 games this season and is a liability on defense when chasing ground balls.

"Even the Dodgers – and I talked to a lot of the scouts – weren't so sure that he was going to be an infielder that could play shortstop," UCLA head coach Gary Adams said. "Half the scouts I talked to after we signed Chase were saying, 'You're not going to play him at short, are you?' That was a very common approach."

As a hitter, Utley has a chance to be one of UCLA's all-time best. As for his defense, Adams says that Utley is where most freshman shortstops are when they begin their careers at UCLA. Adams, though, never had any doubts Utley would play shortstop once he became a Bruin.

"I see him as being more like a Mike Gallego as a defensive player – which is about the best compliment I can give anyone," Adams said. "There is a guy that's got 15 years in the big leagues as a second baseman and shortstop. But I see him being a much better hitter than Gallego."

Adams truly believes Utley can be a capable shortstop at the major-league level because of his work ethic. Utley has only played short since his junior year in high school and needs to work a lot on his defense.

A positive sign for Adams is Utley's commitment to improve himself. Utley is one of those rare players who are automatically willing to work hard in order to get better – he doesn't need anyone else to motivate him. In fact, he's always asking teammates to hit more ground balls to him so that he can improve his fielding.

"I think I can be a major league shortstop," Utley said. "(Adams) is working hard at making me a better infielder, so I gotta work hard with him ... I love to play shortstop. Shortstop is my favorite position. I just have to work on it a little bit more. I'm not quite there right now."

Utley will be the first to admit his defense needs work. But he always keeps a positive attitude on the field no matter what. Utley and junior second baseman Jack Santora often find themselves joking about anything and everything in between pitches. This laid-back approach has allowed Utley to concentrate on the big picture and forget about his on-the-field blunders.

"I don't get down on myself," Utley said. "Maybe at that moment I get a little mad, but there is nothing I can do about it. The play already happened. Next time I get a play like that I'll try not to make the same mistake I made before. If you get mad at yourself, you'll just start making more errors."

For now, everything is looking good for Utley. Although the Dodgers were wonderful and very professional while courting him, Utley feels signing with the Dodgers was the most important error he didn't commit.

Baseball powerhouses like Oklahoma, Cal State Fullerton and Long Beach State recruited him and made him scholarship offers.

Long Beach State was actually the only school to recruit Utley during the fall, because Utley was injured during what his father calls the "Area Code" games – summer exhibitions where coaches and scouts come out and rate the top high school players.

But Utley didn't accept the only offer available to him during the fall because he believed other offers would come – and they did.

"I remember how he had so much confidence in his own judgment to turn down a scholarship offer at a major baseball school in November when there was nothing else out there," David Utley said. "So we were happy that he had some quality choices, but I tell you, as soon as UCLA called, I think that was about it for him – although he has never said so.

"I don't think that he ever imagined he would get a call from UCLA. I think he still pinches himself."

Maybe three years from now, when Utley is once again available for the major league draft, the pursuit of his dream will come to an end. Utley may then sign with a professional club and pinch himself once again just to make sure he knows his chase is finished.

"(My blocking) was better," Stillwell said. "It's not where I want it to be yet. I've been in a little slump blocking-wise, but as long as we're winning I'm happy. I improved tonight and that's all I can ask for. I can't expect to reach where I want to reach in one night."

UCLA's block didn't let anything by in game one. The Bruins jumped out to a quick 7-1 lead with three blocks for points, while forcing two hitting errors. Although the Ramblers went on a five-point run, UCLA rattled off eight points.

The Ramblers were never a factor in game two as UCLA built up an insurmountable 11-2 lead. Setter Brandon Taliaferro scored three of the last four points with an ace, a kill and a block to close out the game.

It took some time to get the points rolling in game three, but once UCLA scored, the Bruins didn't stop. With a 6-0 lead, UCLA seemed to let down, allowing the Ramblers back into the match. The Bruins had six hitting errors, enabling Loyola to close to 13-9.

But UCLA finished the night the same way it began. A stuff block by Evan Thatcher and another block by Naeve ended the Ramblers' ten-game win streak.

"UCLA's real good," Loyola head coach Gordon Mayforth said. "(The pressure cooker) blew up in our face. It didn't come to play.

"All I know is (UCLA) didn't see our game plan. We never got into it. There's a good possibility that (UCLA is) that good that we never had a chance to get to our game plan."

That's why this overt act of hostility by the Giants is so evil. It wasn't enough for them to yank the National League West title away from the Dodgers last year; they had to try and rip the Dodgers apart from the inside now that Butler has retired.

I'm sure Mr. Clancy will back me up when I say that the Dodgers are now officially at war with the Giants. This is no longer a rivalry that inspires Dodger fans to actually stay beyond the seventh-inning stretch; this is now a shooting war. Fort Piazza has been fired upon, and it's time for the Union to respond.

But I think that the Dodgers have already set plans in motion, because one of their heroes is now wearing the orange and black.

Just like Obi Wan Kenobi in "Star Wars," Orel Hershiser is our only hope (although I could never say it in Princess Leia's sensuous tone).

Just you wait and see: Orel Hershiser will show that he still is the Bulldog when he finds a way to sabotage the Giants this year.

And do you think it's a coincidence that corporate raider Rupert Murdoch is buying the Los Angeles Dodgers? I think not.

A man who knows all about using underhanded tactics to get revenge on his foes will know just how to handle Hershiser and get a proportional response together within the next few months.

All of his expertise is going to be necessary, because the San Francisco Giants sure put one over on the Boys in Blue, and now it's payback time.

much you've grown over the four years.

"Coming to UCLA as a freshman was huge. I left my country of Canada, I was at the other side of the continent and I didn't know a soul. But we've bonded. Aren't you supposed to have the best years of your life in college? Yeah, I can say that."

Many feel one can't sum up four years of her life in a sentence or quote. But Ames-Klein gives it a try. Her summary is simple and to the point – the perfect description of these seniors' four years at UCLA.

"It's been fun."

Bruins look to bust streak of mediocrity

W. TENNIS: UCLA hopes to redeem recent losses in matchup vs. Broncos

By Jared Hummel
Daily Bruin Contributor

The UCLA women's tennis team hopes to rebound from a loss to Pepperdine in its matchup against the Boise State Broncos today.

The Broncos are 5-4 this season, fresh off a two-match losing streak in which they fell to University San Diego, 5-4, and San Diego State, 6-3.

Boise State is currently ranked 63rd nationally and features seniors Gayleen McManus, ranked 52nd, and Manon Buskens, ranked 90th.

Last Friday's loss at Pepperdine capped off a two-week stretch of mediocre play for UCLA, dating back to Feb. 19 against William and Mary at the U.S. Tennis Association-Intercollegiate Tennis Association Tournament in Madison, Wis.

In addition to the losses to William and Mary and Pepperdine, the Bruins fell to No. 9 Mississippi in Madison – a string of three losses in four matches.

Injuries have plagued UCLA since the first game of the season. The loss of No. 1 player sophomore Amanda Basica, who is regarded as one of the top collegiate players in the nation, accompanied with the lingering effects of a stress injury to sophomore Katia Roubanava, have greatly hindered the team's performance.

Those empty seats in the LATC are going to have to be warmed up for the UCLA blaze to overcome the No. 10 Trojans.

"USC is a tough team ... and at the moment we are obviously struggling with the two injuries. I honestly believe we can win ... if we'll just make it a team effort," said senior Matt Breen.

That team effort will not only need the talent of Grinda, Allegre, Breen, Decret, Sands and Newman; it will need the support of lady luck, the adrenaline pumped by rivalry and, most importantly, the UCLA crowd.

that we can win. We have a very good chance of winning, especially at home ... We went over there and the crowd was really behind their guys. So hopefully we'll get a crowd out here."

More often than not, it is the crowd that ultimately swings the teeter-totter rivalry matches.

"I feel like since they're coming over here we have a much better chance because we're ready to have a big crowd. We're going to try to get as big a crowd here as possible," said Newman.

Bruin effort can't overcome pitching errors in fall to 49ers

BASEBALL: Long Beach State punishes UCLA for mistakes on mound

By Vytas Mazeika
Daily Bruin Staff

Tuesday was a night to forget for the UCLA baseball team, as Long Beach State came out on top, 21-5.

The Bruins (8-11) were behind 16-3 by the fifth inning and could do nothing right.

The 49ers (6-9) came out determined to pound on the Bruins, and they did just that – four 49er starters combined to hit five home-runs in the game.

"We really broke out this weekend," Long Beach State head coach Dave Snow said. "We just had a lot of confidence tonight."

The Bruins never gave up, but effort was not enough last night. UCLA junior outfielder Eric Valent made a jaw-dropping, head-first, diving catch in the six-run sixth inning, and sophomore designated hitter Michael Hymes beat out an infield single in the eighth.

But when your pitching staff allows 20 earned runs, it is very likely that your team is going to lose.

"It wasn't that nobody wasn't trying," UCLA head coach Gary Adams said. "We just didn't pitch very well, and every mistake we made on the hill, Long Beach State punished us. Some pitchers are going to have to step up."

The offensive outburst by the 49ers started when freshman catcher Bryan Kennedy, who finished the game with six RBIs, hit his first two homers of the season in the first and third innings.

"I've been struggling, so it was great," Kennedy said. "I was just seeing the ball really well tonight."

On the mound for the 49ers, junior left-hander Mike Gallo (1-1) settled down after a three-run first inning to earn his first win of the year. He baffled hitters with his change-up and allowed only two hits and one walk in his last four innings of work.

Long Beach State defeats UCLA, 21-5

"He settled down a lot," Snow said. "He seemed to find his change-up. It's a lot easier pitching when you've got a lot of runs."

On a night the Bruins would rather not remember, Adams sees one positive. Valent not only made a great diving catch, he batted two for three to raise his average to .269 and came within a few feet of a monster four-bagger in the eighth inning.

"I saw signs in Eric Valent coming out of it," Adams said. "He made adjustments tonight. That was a very good sign. It's one of the bright spots for me."

Bruins need fan support to beat USC

M. TENNIS: At home against Trojans, UCLA looks to avenge season's first loss

By Stephanie Chan
Daily Bruin Contributor

There are the loyal fans. There are the stragglers going to or coming from class. There are the officials, the parents, the players. Most of all, there are way too many empty seats in the Los Angeles Tennis Center. Hopefully, this typical scene at UCLA men's tennis matches will change. It needs to if the Bruins are to beat USC at "home" at 1:30 p.m. today.

On Feb. 13, it was Southern Cal's crowd that pushed them through a close match to beat the Bruins on Trojan turf, 4-3.

"I'm going to be pumped up because ... we are playing them at home, and everyone wants revenge. We are waiting for them," said junior Vince Allegre.

The team would like to say they are "ready and waiting," but the "ready" part has yet to be decided. The Bruins sit waiting without Jason Cook and possibly Brandon Kramer in their lineup due to injury.

"We're missing a couple of our better players, so the other guys are really going to have to step up, and sometimes that's very difficult for a guy who's never played in that kind of match," said UCLA head coach Billy Martin.

"(Chris Sands) was kind of thrown into the fire of having to win one of those pressure matches (at USC). The first time out, that's difficult."

In UCLA's last meeting with a USC redshirt freshman, Sands felt the weight of a tied match on his shoulders.

"It came down to my match. I could have decided it, and I didn't win it. So I'd definitely like to get some revenge, come out strong against them," said Sands.

The revenge factor has been brewing these past two weeks after USC handed UCLA its first loss of the season.

"(This will be) an exciting match ... especially after I discovered the ambience the last time we played them," said freshman Jean-Noel Grinda.

"It was my first tough, tough game with UCLA. I lost my own match, so I'm pretty fired up to take my revenge."

Grinda lost to USC's George Bastl, 6-2, 6-2.

Though the Bruins seem ready mentally, they still need to hurdle the barrier of injury. Since the team is not 100 percent healthy, the lost percentage points may need to be made up with luck.

"We need a little luck. We've had some circumstances that haven't been great for us so far this year. But if we get a little luck and play some good tennis, we can get a win," said Martin.

"I'm not overly confident, but I still think we can win. ... It certainly will be tough for us. I certainly like a challenge, and this will be a challenge for us. Anytime we play the Trojans we're going to give it 127 percent."

If luck will not pull the Bruins through, a rivalry just might do the trick.

"There's no chance they'll beat us two times in a row, no chance," said freshman Noah Newman.

But with the spirit of rivalry also comes splinter-margin matches.

"I think it's going to be tight regardless, whether we win or lose," said senior Alex Decret.

"I don't think we'll blow them out of the water ... I think

After four years together, these young women share unique bond

By Steve Kim
Daily Bruin Staff

What do you call a group of eight healthy, happy senior swimmers?

An energetic festival of estrogen. These UCLA swimmers are the ones who quite frequently drive head coach Cyndi Gallagher nuts. They're the notorious group assistant coach Brad Burnham jokes he ran away from, alluding to his temporary absence after their freshman year. They may have matured over four years, but their strong identity as a group despite the diversity in their personalities makes this group downright lively.

"All of us have really unique qualities that add to the group," one senior said.

The senior class of 1998 started out as 10 freshmen recruits in the fall of 1994. They were as different as could be, from bubbly Lindsay Etter to quiet and monotonic Cindy Bertelink to off-the-wall Jill Jenkins.

Their fate within the sport of swimming has brought them to UCLA and assigned them to each other. Where they decided to go to school was their choice, but who their teammates would be was not.

"I remember the first time we came here," recalls Lara Potter, "the first thing our coach Cyndi said was, 'OK, our No. 1 goal here is to have fun. No. 2 is to swim fast.' I was like shocked, but I think that's the spirit of our class – to give the team a positive attitude. I have my fondest memories with these girls."

After the initial freshman jitters, they had no trouble getting along. In fact, they may have gotten along too well. They were inseparable; joined at the hip; a she-gang of eager, wide-eyed freshmen.

They were together day and night, night and day. Even after a six-hour practice day, they met at a certain time each evening at the Hedrick dining hall. When the girls got sick of dorm food, they started a "supper club," where they cooked for each other. Thursday nights to remind them of the home cooking they so missed in dorm life.

"Yeah, but I don't think supper club is quite home cooking!" jokes Kiley Ames-Klein.

They chatted nightly. They hung out on weekends, when they weren't swimming. They even took road trips to places like San Francisco and Lake Tahoe, where they went sledding in bikinis.

And then came the harsh reality of growing up and becoming independent adults. The togetherness and enthusiasm of the class deteriorated with age. They lost three girls who each dropped out of the swimming program. Each took on her own interests and spent more time away from the group.

Basically, the friendship and respect for each other were still there, but the tight bond that held them together since their freshman year had been broken naturally and gradually by that process called life.

Amidst the loss of old friends, they have gained transfer student Leslie Carr. She may have missed two years of swimming in the UCLA program, but she looks at it as gaining two more.

"I was nervous coming in as a transfer because I didn't know anyone," Carr said. "They invited me to their supper club and made me feel right at home. The support and fellowship I've had was just amazing. Looking back at it, it's been the best two years I could've ever asked for. It's an experience I would never trade."

Carr's teammate, Jenkins, agrees about the importance of their bonding.

"It's an experience not a lot of people get to have, and we're very fortunate we've got to spend these years together even though it hasn't been always good," Jenkins said. "We were all different people thrown together. We've done different things but we've always come together."

Four years of getting up at 5:30 a.m. for their morning swim. Four years of stretching their dedication with varying results. But win or lose, like it or not, they've been together as part of the UCLA swimming team. And while some others may be driven up the wall spending so much time with each other, it has been an unforgettable four years for these swimmers.

"You come into college not knowing any of them," Etter said, "and then you go through your hardest times in workouts to the best times, seeing them swim successfully. I came in not being able to realize what all this would be like, and now I know. And I'm thankful for them, more now than I thought I would ever be."

"We've been there for each other through good and bad times," said Katie Stuppi. "We feel like we can go to each other any time."

Many will remain and finish school next year, but there are a few more things they still have to do as a group before this year ends. They've planned a spring break to Hawaii, and there will be more supper clubs even after their last season together.

Then, there's the traditional year-end ritual, the naked swim, where seniors take it all off in the Men's Gym pool for their last team workout of the season. It's a way of feeling more at one with the water.

"You can just say in advance that I loved the naked swim!" Jenkins said. "But there will be no jump starts off the diving blocks."

Whether Jenkins's nude-diving statement applied to just her or the whole group, her teammates showed gratitude for the announcement.

So there are still moments of fun for these grown-ups. After all, fun is what college swimming has been all about.

"Just recently, I remember seeing a random poster picture of us as freshmen in a club hockey game crowd," recalls Bertelink. "It's so funny to look at how young you looked and how

From a simple rivalry comes an all-out battle of espionage

COLUMN: Brett Butler's betrayal an exercise in sabotage of Dodgers

Someone should call Tom Clancy, because the plot to his next thriller is unfolding in Chavez Ravine.

Let me tell you, this one has it all: sleeper agents, betrayal, false allegiances and backstabbing.

Mark Shapiro

It all started with ex-Dodger Brett Butler ripping into the Thor of the Southland, Mike Piazza, calling him moody and accusing him of not having leadership qualities.

Butler told the Los Angeles Times, "Mike Piazza is a moody, self-centered, '90s player."

Sure, this isn't the nicest thing in the world for Butler to say, especially since no one remembers him trying to fill the leadership void that cost the Dodgers dearly down the stretch last year.

And no one wants to see the premier hitter in the National League get insulted by a player who was best known for his ability to bunt his way to first base.

But that's not at the heart of the matter, for something far more sinister is going on here: Brett Butler has revealed his true identity.

While we may have thought he was a dyed-in-the-wool Dodger, in reality, he was a spy working for the San Francisco Giants.

Now follow me on this one:

Before Butler ever put on a Dodger uniform, he spent several productive and successful years with the Giants, beloved and treasured by those strange few who root for the San Francisco team.

All of a sudden, this man from Hunter's Point suddenly dons the sacred blue and white and says that he really is a Dodger at heart.

Did the Dodgers unwittingly allow this enemy behind the lines, as the Giants activated this sleeper agent and then watched with glee as he became part of Dodger lore?

Did Butler not meld himself into our hearts with his courageous comeback from cancer?

And were we not all completely snowed when, in his first game in a Dodger uniform at Candlestick Park, he gave former Dodger manager Tom Lasorda a big hug?

We all fell for it, we all knew and trusted this man, and he used that to tear us apart.

People believed Butler then, so why wouldn't they believe him now? Why wouldn't they think that Piazza failed to live up to expectations last year?

Why would gutty, silver-haired, born-again Brett ever say such things?

Because he's a Giant spy, that's why!

THE CHASE OF A LIFETIME

Though he turned down the Dodgers for UCLA, Utley is happy with choice

By Vytas Mazeika
Daily Bruin Staff

Chase: \'châs\ verb – to follow rapidly: to pursue.

Somehow, UCLA's Chase Utley doesn't seem to live up to his name. His favorite TV show is ESPN's "Baseball Tonight." His favorite song is the traditional "Take Me Out to the Ball Game." The most famous person he's ever met is former Los Angeles Dodgers head coach Tommy Lasorda. He was even drafted in the second round of the major league draft by the Dodgers.

And although he sees himself playing professional baseball in 10 years, Utley has chosen not to pursue that specific dream right now. Instead he has decided to turn down a rumored six-figure offer from the Dodgers to attend college.

"His mother and I attempted to paint both sides – the pros and the cons either way," his father David Utley said. "But ultimately the decision was his. We weren't going to have it hanging over our heads if he felt like he made the wrong decision. But from what I can tell, he's convinced he made he right decision."

His dad, who also says Utley was hooked on baseball ever since he chucked his son whiffle balls when he was four or five, is right about how his son feels.

"I was pretty close to signing (with the Dodgers)," Utley said. "It was kind of a last-minute decision not to sign ... but I don't have any regrets for not signing."

By the way, there is something else you should know. Utley hasn't entirely given up his favorite past-time – he has merely chosen to spend at least the next three years (college players cannot be drafted again until after their junior year) refining his baseball skills while studying at UCLA.

Utley, who stands in at 6 feet 1 inch and 175 pounds, is the Bruins' starting shortstop and No. 6 hitter. As of Sunday, Utley had a .314 batting average, with three homers, 13 RBIs, 10 runs scored, seven walks, 18 strike-outs and was one for three in stolen-base attempts.

While at Long Beach Polytechnic High School, Utley batted .525 with 12 home runs and 48 RBIs his senior season. He succeeded in 12 out of 13 steal attempts and had a mind-boggling 16 walks compared to only two strikeouts.

He was named an All-American by Collegiate Baseball, Baseball America, the American Baseball Coaches Association and the National High School Baseball Coaches Association. Utley is also only one of three Bruins (along with pitchers Chad Cislak and Rob Henkel) to participate in Team USA Fall Trials.

With attributes like these, one would have to believe that Utley has the potential to become another of a great line of young, power-hitting shortstops entering Major League Baseball right now – a list including Alex Rodriguez (Mariners), Nomar Garciaparra (Red Sox) and Derek Jeter (Yankees).

CHARLES KUO/Daily Bruin

Top-notch freshman Chase Utley postponed entering the majors to play Bruin baseball.

"They're great players, and I think anybody would love to play like them," Utley said. "But not everybody can, and hopefully I can have some of their success and go from there."

Other factors that may contribute to success at the next level for Utley are his approach at the plate and his attention to the details of the game. Not only is Utley a left-handed hitting infielder (very rare), but he's also very patient – as his eight-to-one ratio of walks to strikeouts his senior year in high school indicates.

Also, Utley doesn't rely on co-captain Eric Valent (a junior outfielder) for advice. But Utley is astute enough to play close attention to how pitchers handle Valent because of their similarities as hitters. Since both of them are left-handed hitters with adept power, pitchers tend to approach Utley the same way as Valent.

M. VOLLEYBALL: Loyola cracks under pressure of UCLA's superb blocking

By Grace Wen
Daily Bruin Staff

The pressure cooker wasn't working last night.

The UCLA men's volleyball team brought so much heat to the court that Loyola University of Chicago's "pressure-cooking offense" exploded. In less than an hour and a half, the Bruins disposed of the Ramblers 15-6, 15-4, 15-9.

"We played well tonight," UCLA head coach Al Scates said. "I liked Tom Stillwell's blocking. That's the best he's blocked all season in terms of getting over the net and penetrating.

"Technically, we're blocking very well. It's up to the other team whether they choose in some situations to hit the ball out or hit it into the block. Loyola didn't hit it out as many of our opponents had been doing, so we blocked more. I'm happy with our block and our play."

The Bruin block dominated the night, holding the No. 1 hitting team in the nation to a mere .162 attack percentage.

UCLA, on the other hand, hit a whopping .415, including a .629 clip in game two. Sophomore Adam Naeve led the attack with 17 kills in 22 attempts for a blistering .727 percentage. Senior captain Stillwell chipped in 11 kills to go along with his five blocks.

UCLA forges alliance with Orthopaedic Hospital

HEALTH CARE: Better service for community prompts two forces in medicine to pool resources

By Kathryn Combs
Daily Bruin Staff

Two of the most prestigious medical institutions in Los Angeles – the Orthopaedic Hospital of Los Angeles and UCLA – signed a letter of intent on Monday, marking the beginning of a long term clinical relationship.

While the two institutions will begin immediately to work out a solid agreement, this alliance will bring many benefits to each party, said Gerald Levey, provost of the UCLA School of Medicine.

"It's a wonderful thing for UCLA," Levey said. "(The alliance) will bring together two nationally and internationally recognized clinical orthopaedic operations."

"This will immeasurably strengthen our clinical presence in orthopaedics and it will (also) aid the educational process both for students and post-graduate trainees," Levey added.

This alliance will not only enhance the clinical and research activities, but UCLA and the Orthopaedic Hospital will also benefit economically.

"With the advent of managed care and pressures on hospitals, it is difficult for a hospital with a single specialty to survive," said Dr. Gerald Finerman, chair of the UCLA department of orthopedics.

While the letter of intent is not a finalized agreement, it indicates both parties are serious about developing a working relationship, said David Langness, director of UCLA Health Science Communications.

The alliance has already been approved by the Orthopaedic Hospital's governing board and is expected to be approved by the regents in May.

However, during negotiations the two institutions came to some initial agreement as to what they were seeking in entering such an alliance.

According to Langness, the alliance is a chance for both institutions to expand their services and abilities.

"Today you need to have a extensive network of physicians, clinics, outreach sites, modalities and patients to run an effective health care network," he said.

While each of the institutions will continue

CAREERS: Professionals stress importance of networking, internships

By Marisa Yamane
Daily Bruin Contributor

Tinsel Town's most powerful people were present at the Ackerman Grand Ballroom on Tuesday evening.

Everyone from Tina Turner's publicist to Kevin Costner's personal manager; from the assistant to the executive producer of "The Tonight Show" with Jay Leno to a sports producer for ESPN and FOX.

What did all 54 have in common? They're all UCLA alumni professionals who participated in Entertainment Night.

The event was a career networking opportunity for UCLA students to meet and talk with alumni in an industry where success is based heavily upon who you know.

"The most impressive part was the caliber of the alumni in the entertainment industry that participated," said Jennifer Wolf, a fourth-year student and the Alumni Association's executive director of the Career Network Committee.

Many of the alumni stressed that perseverance is so important in the entertainment industry. "If you can stick through the nos and wait for that yes, then you'll make it," said Eddie Cibrain, whom fans know as Cole St. John on the daytime drama "Sunset Beach."

The entertainment industry is one of the most competitive fields. The chances are usually against you. Many times, there are a thousand applicants vying for one position. "One vital element is luck, because there's so many people who want that one job," said George Takei, best known for his portrayal of Mr. Sulu in the acclaimed television series "Star Trek."

Many of the alumni recommended students to find internships or any type of job to get their foot in the door. "The advantage is that you'll get to network and hear about opening positions before they're even posted," said Chris Bess, a publicist with the Walt Disney Company.

Many of the alumni commented that the entertainment industry is not as glamorous as it may appear. The work days are long. There are very few breaks. And there's a great deal of stress involved. But for those who are passionate about the industry, it is a rewarding experience.

"The best part about my job is making a client's dreams come true. Sometimes it happens overnight, and sometimes it takes forever," said Ken Stovitz, an agent for Creative Artists Agency, who represents actors such as Will Smith.

With the overwhelming number of students and impressive list of alumni, organizers declared Entertainment Night a success.

"UCLA has put out some amazing grads who are some of the most powerful people in the entertainment industry," said Steve Sauer, a personal manager/producer for Students' union wins bid for research center's café

ASUCLA: Capital for plan will be money previously marked for cash reserves

By Michael Weiner
Daily Bruin Contributor

ASUCLA has received a contract to build and operate a restaurant on the first floor of the Gonda (Goldschmeid) Neuroscience and Genetics Research Center.

The students' association board of directors approved the project and its funding at its meeting on Feb. 27. The Gonda project will change ASUCLA's five-year plan for financial recovery by using funds that were supposed to be put into reserve next year.

ASUCLA first bid for the project last fall, made a presentation of its concepts for the restaurant in December and was notified of selection in January.

"In the building, there has always been planned a café, and last fall, there was the beginning of a selection process for who would operate the café," said ASUCLA Executive Director Patricia Eastman.

"We developed a concept for the café that included architectural design, a menu and a management structure, and we presented that to the selection committee," she continued.

According to George Conde, capital programs project manager for the Gonda building, ASUCLA was chosen for the project because of its superior ideas in terms of both menu items and architectural design. Three other organizations were considered for the project.

"We had considered other vendors and ASUCLA made the best presentation," Conde said.

ASUCLA will finance most of the project and changes will have to be made in its budget for the current year in order to do that.

"Most of the cost of building the restaurant will be borne by ASUCLA," Eastman said.

"My plan is to forego other capital projects that we had in the budget," she continued. "There are several small projects, some of which we don't have to do because circumstances have changed, and some of which will wait until next year."

An example of a project that is no longer needed, but was in the budget, was the installation of doors between the Viewpoint Lounge and the Viewpoint Cafe. ASUCLA determined that this was not a change that Ong's goals for the office include promoting diversity, protecting the rights of graduate and professional students and strengthening the graduate and professional student community.

"I want to help bring about better coalition building," said Ong. "I want to develop some type of network that will improve the sense of community among graduate students," he said.

Job outlook great for 1998 graduates

A booming job market will greet 1998 graduates interested in technology-related fields.

A lack of engineering and computer science majors has job recruiters scrambling to find new employees. Current offers for graduating seniors are as high as $50,000 including bonuses of 10 percent to 20 percent.

A 40 percent decrease in computer science and engineering majors during a shift from an industrial-based economy to one of service has increased the demand for technology majors.

Liberal arts majors are also benefiting from the demand to fill technological jobs. Job Outlook '98, a survey conducted by the National Association of Colleges and Employers, said the starting salaries for graduating liberal arts majors has increased 6.5 percent since last year, to an average of $28,875.

Companies are willing to train graduates of all majors to fill open positions, said Camille Luckenbaugh, director of employment information at NACE.

"Liberal arts majors are attractive to employers because they come prepared with communication skills and the ability to learn technical skills," Luckenbaugh said.

The lack of computer-science students is causing somewhat of a crisis for businesses desperate for experienced employees. The Clinton administration has reported spending $28 million in 1997 to train new workers, and the Department of Education said that although there was a slight increase in computer science majors, it is not enough.

Technological recruiter for ITS Technology Inc., Chad Fengley, said he looks to hire graduates with job market experience.

"I look for students who have two years or more of experience with internships or co-oping," Fengley said. "Experience in computer design is also an attractive attribute."

Fengley said ITS is now hiring an average of one employee per month. Only 3 percent of companies surveyed by NACE said that they were going to cut back on hiring next year, and Luckenbaugh sees no decline in the near future.

"With the way things are going, the demand for technological jobs will be there," she said. "I can't see that changing in the next 10 years; if anything, it will become even more dominant."

More actors lighting up on movie screen

While declining in the general population, smoking in the top-grossing movies is on the rise, according to UC San Francisco researchers.

Sampling five of the top 20 grossing movies from 1990 to 1996, researchers Stanton A. Glantz and Theresa F. Stockwell found that 57 percent of the leading characters smoked. Only 14 percent of similar people smoke in the general population.

In the 1960s researchers found that tobacco was used once every five minutes, this number decreased in the 1970s and 1980s to about once in every 15 minutes. The number is now back up to once every three to five minutes.

"The use of tobacco in films is increasing and is reinforcing misleading images that present smoking as a widespread and socially desirable activity," said Glantz.

Despite the warnings of the dangers of smoking, only 14 percent present the negative effects of smoking.

Characters who smoke are overwhelmingly middle and upper class, while the number of smokers from a lower socioeconomic class has decreased.

"As in tobacco advertising, tobacco use in the movies is associated with youthful vigor, good health, good looks and personal and professional acceptance," said researchers.

Researchers pointed out that this increase in on screen smoking corresponds with a decrease in advertising for tobacco. Glantz and Stockwell suggested anti-tobacco advertisements be aired by movie theaters to combat the smoking message in the films.

Her busy schedule still leaves time for jaunts to Westwood

April Liening prepares for a speech she's to give later that night.

THE REAL BRUINS

Every Thursday, the Daily Bruin takes a look at members of the UCLA community. In this continuing series, we highlight the many different activities Bruins are involved in.

April Liening, who is enjoying her third year living at Dykstra Hall, plays basketball with a friend.

If April Liening wasn't such a heavy sleeper, there would be trouble in Dykstra 719. Construction on the De Neve Plaza Project has kept many students awake early in the morning for the past two years, but hasn't been loud enough to drive some Dykstra faithfuls away.

"This is my third year living in Dykstra," said Liening, a third-year English student. And next year, she plans to return once again.

The social aspect of Dykstra Hall is what keeps her coming back. Not that the weekly complimentary soda and candy hurt.

As a form of compensation for construction inconveniences around the hall – which has translated into the destruction of the dining hall, fireside lounge and basketball courts, plus the addition of makeshift driveways and foot paths – Dykstra residents are appeased with free refrigerators and other perks.

"It's a pain to walk to the other dorms," she said, adding that her biggest "pet peeve" is the hassle that accompanies retrieving her mail. When Dykstra's second-floor lobby was removed, the mailboxes were also destroyed.

"There are almost a thousand people in this building, and it's a pain for them," Liening said. As an employee at the front desk, one of her most time-consuming (and annoying) jobs is "a pain for us, too." She has to go through the thousands of pieces of mail by hand.

But despite the numerous inconveniences caused by the creation of the Bradley Center and future residential housing complexes, Liening loves living at Dykstra.

"I figure I have the rest of my life to live in an apartment. Dykstra's a very friendly place," she said, explaining that the physical design of the building sets it apart from the other residential halls. "With the doors across from each other, it really leads to interaction."

Based on Liening's social life, however, Dykstra's facing doors shouldn't get all of the credit. As a leader in Bruin Christian Fellowship (BCF), a Dykstra front desk employee and the owner of a very full Mortar Board planner, Liening creates much of the friendly atmosphere that surrounds her.

In her room, which she shares with Florence Chung, a second-year psychology and education student, Liening's love for her fellow seventh-floor residents is obvious. Snapshots of neighbors plaster the framing of her overhead loft.

Several students lay sprawled on a mattress and papasan chair and Liening recalls episodes of "floor bonding."

"People are so into floor bonding, that they're willing to spend a whole night of being uncomfortable just to be together," she said, remembering a time earlier this year when a group of students gathered to watch the movie "Seven."

After the movie was over, a half dozen students shared space on the beds, futon and patches of empty carpeting for a sleep-over.

"Remember the time we put toothpaste on Elias' face?" Liening laughed to one of her friends, recalling another late-night escapade.

"No, that was me," said Eric Gandhi, a first-year business economics student, who didn't remember the occasion so happily. Gandhi is just one of many students who share a sort of adversarial relationship with Liening.

"Our floor talks so much smack,"

Unity key to solving pressing problems of inequality

PEACE: Prejudice in jobs, on campus the topics of sparsely attended forum

By Michelle Navarro
Daily Bruin Staff

Annie Yang told some horrible Disneyland stories at a conference on inequality, but there were fewer than 15 people there to hear them.

"People won't come to a thing like this," said Mariana Roytman, a second-year communication studies student and member of Hillel. She explained that people are unwilling to hear alternate views to their own.

"People should be standing outside this door wanting to come in. They need to be here. People are just not willing to put in the effort," she said, "and one of the things we should be talking about is how do we do that."

That is why they were all there, at the Baha'i panel discussion on equality and diversity – to figure out what needs to be done to bring unity from diversity, a goal the Baha'i faith strives to achieve.

The panel began with sharing personal experiences and then moved on to figuring out what borders and boundaries are created from inequality. To wrap up the evening, they brainstormed possible methods of combatting the problem.

Unfortunately, the UCLA students who could aid in accomplishing this common aim were absent from the Kerckhoff room. But the apparent apathy of fellow students didn't stop the intimate group from sharing ideas and creating what they called the first step to ending inequality.

The event was sponsored by the Baha'i Club, an organization that celebrates the Baha'i faith. The founder, Baha'u'llah, emphasized the importance of unity in God, religion and humanity. The panel was facilitated by Cynthia Thomas, career counselor supervisor at the Career Center.

When the panelists each told a past experience, one in particular struck the small gathering.

Yang, a representative from Peer Educators, talked about her experience working at Disneyland. The Orange County native said she was initially placed in Tomorrowland and was happy with her job.

But when an open transfer period presented an opportunity for her to switch to Fantasyland, her land of choice because of the atmosphere and Swiss-like uniform employees wear, she got a wake up call.

"I showed up for the interview and they said, 'We're looking for someone a little different from you,'" said the second-year molecular biology student. "Then I asked 'Well who are you looking for?' And then they said, 'We're looking for someone who will contribute to the environment of Fantasyland.'"

According to Yang, that meant someone who looked like "Heidi from Switzerland." Yang then realized that perhaps one of the reasons why she was recruited to Tomorrowland to begin with, and why most of the workers around her were Asian, was because they fit in with the image of that land – "high technology, all these Asians."

AELIA KHAN

Adesua Ilogienboh, a first-year biochemistry student, speaks at a panel discussion on equality, diversity and peace sponsored by the Baha'i Club.

Yang then made the connection with Adventureland and said that it's image was of "football-playing guys and girls with freckles."

To test her theory of their hiring practices, she did an experiment. Yang applied under a different name, Heidi Peterson, to see if that would make a difference to Disney employers.

"I didn't show up for the interview, but I called and they said, 'we're so excited to meet you' and 'there are so many openings for you,'" Yang recounted to the shocked room. Yang did not continue working at Disneyland.

Yang joked about suing the entertainment giant with $5 in her pocket, but the students all knew it was no laughing matter. It was a serious problem that she felt powerless to stop.

"With something that big you don't even know where to start," Yang said.

Another student echoed Yang's sense of helplessness and talked

Greenspan urges Congress to take cautious route with surpluses

ECONOMY: Committee should hold off on plans until money is assured

By Martin Crutsinger
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON – The best thing Congress can do for the economy is to put the federal budget on a path of "significant surplus" for the coming years, Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan said.

He urged members of the House Budget Committee on Wednesday to resist the lure to increase spending, cut taxes or pursue a new idea such as devoting surpluses to the creation of millions of Individual Retirement Accounts – at least until the surpluses are much more assured.

The IRA suggestion, being pushed by House Budget Committee Chairman John Kasich, R-Ohio, is the latest proposal to be thrown onto the table as government policy-makers face a challenge they haven't seen in three decades – what to do with a budget surplus.

President Clinton last month proposed a budget for the 1999 fiscal year that projected the first federal surplus since 1969 and urged Congress to "save Social Security first" by reserving the projected excess to deal with the shortfalls coming in the next century when the Baby Boomers begin retiring.

The Congressional Budget Office this week said the economy's continued good performance will push the budget into surplus one year earlier than Clinton envisioned. It projected surpluses of $8 billion for the current fiscal year and $9 billion next year.

While some Republicans in Congress want to use the surpluses to provide bigger tax cuts, Kasich this week suggested devoting the surpluses to creating a new form of Individual Retirement Accounts for everyone paying into Social Security, putting the investments in private stocks and bonds.

> "(The economy) is becoming increasingly benign."
> Alan Greenspan
> Federal Reserve chairman

Greenspan agreed that the idea had merit, saying he believed some form of "privatization" of Social Security would ultimately be part of the solution to the Social Security problem.

But he said he still believed the best use of the surpluses in the beginning is to reserve them to pay down the national debt. He said in this way policy-makers would be beginning a "virtuous cycle" in which a declining national debt – now at $5.4 trillion – would mean the government would have to make lower interest payments each year, and that would translate into even bigger surpluses.

All these developments help the overall economy by reducing interest rates that consumers and businesses have to pay, something that is already happening, Greenspan said.

"I think an extraordinary, important amount of confidence in the budget process has been gained in recent years," he told the committee, adding that this new market confidence "has contributed massively to the extent of prosperity" the country now enjoys.

"Putting the unified budget into significant surplus would be the surest and most direct way of increasing national saving," Greenspan said.

Rep. Earl Pomeroy, D-N.D., questioned the workability of Kasich's proposal. He said it would require establishing some 200 million separate investment accounts, and dividing up all the projected surpluses would mean each account would only receive $755 over the next six years to invest in stocks and bonds.

On the economy, Greenspan said the impact of the Asian crisis loomed as the biggest uncertainty for the United States this year – repeating an

Court rules on-the-job harassment can be same sex

JURISPRUDENCE: New guidelines are set, but many questions remain

By Richard Carelli
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON – On-the-job torment can be illegal sexual harassment even when the offender and victim are the same sex, the Supreme Court said Wednesday in a decision that could touch virtually every American workplace.

The court said same-sex harassment can violate a federal anti-discrimination law as it voted unanimously to revive a Louisiana lawsuit closely watched by the nation's employers and gay-rights groups.

In that lawsuit, a man alleged he was sexually harassed by three other men while working on a Gulf of Mexico oil rig.

Wednesday's decision provided important new guidelines for resolving sex-harassment claims, but plenty of questions remain about the legality of certain conduct in specific employment settings.

"Common sense and an appropriate sensitivity to social context will enable courts and juries to distinguish" between what is legal and illegal, Justice Antonin Scalia wrote for the court.

"We're very pleased with the common sense standard the court adopted," said Ann Reesman, a lawyer for the Equal Employment Advisory Council, an employers' group. "This adds some clarity."

Gay-rights advocates also praised the ruling. "Civil rights law will no longer unfairly exclude same-sex sexual harassment, and this fact will benefit all American workers," said Elizabeth Birch of the Human Rights Campaign.

The ruling allows victims of homosexual harassment to get into federal court even though Congress never has said bias based on sexual orientation is illegal.

Kathy Rodgers of the NOW Legal Defense and Education Fund said the ruling "once and for all places sexual harassment law squarely in the mainstream of anti-discrimination law."

The term "harassment" does not appear in the text of the anti-bias law known as Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. But the Supreme Court ruled in 1986 that sexual harassment amounts to discrimination if it creates a "hostile environment" in the workplace.

In subsequent rulings, the justices said a hostile environment can come about not only by overtly sexual behavior but also by "discriminatory intimidation, ridicule and insult ... sufficiently severe or pervasive to alter the conditions of the victim's employment."

Scalia's seven-page opinion said, "We see no justification ... for a categorical rule excluding same-sex harassment claims from the coverage of Title VII." But he warned lower courts about mistaking "ordinary socializing in the workplace – such as male-on-male horseplay or intersexual flirtation – for discriminatory conditions of employment."

All circumstances must be considered, Scalia said and gave the example

Indonesia's students call for Suharto's ouster

PROTEST: Despite unrest assembly seeks to grant president another term

By Christopher Torchia
The Associated Press

JAKARTA, Indonesia – Thousands of banner-waving university students demanded President Suharto's ouster Wednesday – the largest display of anger yet over the economic crisis that has Indonesia in an upheaval.

The protests came as the United States and other foreign lenders stepped up the pressure on Suharto to carry out reforms they consider crucial to rescuing the economy – reforms that could undercut much of Suharto's power and wealth.

"Hang Suharto!" shouted protesters in the Java island city of Yogyakarta, circling their campus on scooters under the scrutiny of hundreds of police and plainclothes officers.

Students also rallied in several other cities on Java as well as on Sulawesi, another of Indonesia's larger islands.

Five people have been killed in riots this year, but Wednesday's rallies were peaceful. Confined to campuses, they posed little threat to Suharto, who has resisted calls to overhaul the government he began shaping in the 1960s.

Even as the students protested, delegates to a special assembly were preparing to extend Suharto's 32-year rule. Already Asia's longest-serving leader, the 76-year-old president is almost certain to get a seventh five-year term next week.

However, Suharto is under growing international pressure to carry out economic reforms in exchange for $43 billion bailout by the International Monetary Fund.

The IMF has already handed over $3 billion but still has not decided whether to grant the second $3 billion installment, due March 15.

The United States, which exerts virtual veto power over the IMF, says Suharto is not moving fast enough on reforms that would remove business perks he, his family and their associates have long enjoyed.

Indonesia says many of the measures, including the slashing of subsidies, are too strict and could provoke more social unrest.

But with the deadline nearing, Suharto said Wednesday that he had dismantled a string of monopolies in line with the IMF requirements. In a meeting of top economic advisers, he said the government has stripped the state agency Bulog of all trade controls except for a rice monopoly.

Presidential spokesman Murdiono, who attended the meeting, quoted Suharto's remarks on

Li Peng chosen to preside over annual session of legislature

CHINA: Premier on the way to becoming next chairman of congress

By John Leicester
The Associated Press

BEIJING – Premier Li Peng was chosen Wednesday to preside over the 15-day annual session of China's legislature, the surest sign yet that he will take over as permanent head of the body.

Qiao Shi, who Li is expected to become the next chairman of the National People's Congress, gave Li control of a meeting of senior legislative officials today after they chose him and eight others to lead the session.

The biggest task for the National People's Congress session, which starts Thursday, will be approving a sweeping government shakeup. It will likely include the paring down of government ministries and the promotion of Vice Premier Zhu Rongji, China's economic policymaker, to premier.

The details were worked out by Communist Party leaders at a closed-door conclave last week. Their agenda is guaranteed to pass

WORLD & NATION BRIEFS

Kyoto accord to push up home energy costs

WASHINGTON – A White House economist today predicted household energy costs would increase a modest $70 to $100 a year if the nation implements the global warming agreement crafted in Kyoto, Japan.

The estimate, presented at a House Commerce subcommittee hearing, was greeted with skepticism from both Republican and Democratic lawmakers.

Janet Yellen, head of the president's Council of Economic Advisers, acknowledged "uncertainties" in the administration's estimate. But she said the conclusion was that the cost of the Kyoto agreement "will be modest under the conditions we have identified."

Yellen said the analysis concludes that energy prices would rise by an average of 3 to 5 percent under last December's international pact to control the Earth's greenhouse gases. Gasoline prices would increase 3 to 4 percent, according to the estimate.

The agreement, which has received criticism, calls for reducing greenhouse gases to 7 percent below 1990 levels by 2008-2012. The pact must still be ratified by the Senate where its cost is expected to be a key issue.

Yellen argued that the cost of the greenhouse emission reductions would be significantly curtailed by an international emissions trading program and early efforts to boost energy efficiency and conservation programs. Costs also would be offset by lower electricity rates as the power industry becomes more competitive.

Missing teenager's body found in alley

Attackers allegedly held a teenage couple hostage for three days before killing the boy and dumping his body in a South Los Angeles alley and taking the girl to a forest where she was raped, shot and left to die, authorities said Wednesday.

The body of Chad MacDonald, 17, was found at 12:54 p.m. Tuesday, and the coroner's office established positive identification Wednesday, Sgt. Susan Cross said. The cause of death wasn't immediately disclosed.

The 16-year-old girl, found bleeding and partially clothed Tuesday on Highway 39 in Angeles National Forest, remained in serious condition at County-USC Medical Center.

The girl, whose name was withheld because she was the victim of a sex crime, was shot in the jaw by the attackers and left to die at the mouth of a metal culvert running below the road, sheriff's Deputy Al Martin said.

Prosecutors arrest former Nazi officer

FRANKFURT, Germany – German authorities have arrested a former Nazi officer for investigation as an accessory to the 1942-43 killings of 70,000 Jews at a death camp in Poland, prosecutors said today.

The 78-year-old suspect admitted that he personally shot 500 men, women and children in November 1943 at the former Nazi camp at Majdanek, in Lublin, eastern Poland, prosecutors said in a statement.

German security sources identified the man as Alfons Goetzfried, but prosecutors would not immediately confirm that.

Prosecutors have identified new suspects through recently opened files from the former communist East Bloc and are pursuing investigations of suspects considered too minor to have been brought to justice during the famous Nuremberg trials. Many suspected war criminals were able to escape prosecution in the turbulent postwar years.

Prosecutors won't say how the latest suspect was identified, only that he incriminated himself while testifying for a separate investigation in July.

Proposal to combat flood damage close to victory

LEGISLATION: Advocates say measure will restore, not destroy, river region

The Associated Press

NAPA, Calif. – A proposal that could quell flood worries while replenishing the Napa River appeared headed to victory today.

Measure A – a sales-tax proposal also known as the Napa County flood protection and watershed management plan – needed a two-thirds majority to win approval.

With all 113 precincts reporting, the measure was leading with 18,522 votes, or 68 percent in favor, and 8,835 votes, or 32 percent, opposed.

"There are less than a thousand votes remaining," Cindy Book, the county's election supervisor, said today.

Book said a final count wouldn't be available until this afternoon.

If approved, Measure A will raise $6 million annually for the next 20 years through a sales tax amounting to one half-cent on every dollar.

Proponents argue that the plan will restore wetlands and forests while replenishing the river with fish.

In addition, backers say the plan is unique because its emphasis is on river restoration, not destruction.

Traditional flood control projects involve confining rivers and creeks. By contrast, the Napa River plan would restore marshlands and trees, limiting the use of concrete to a channel that would confine the river for a short distance to protect historic buildings.

"There are projects on the Mississippi River that involve letting large portions of land near breached levees revert back to natural flood plain, but (the Napa) plan is much more intensive," said Paul Bowers of the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, who is helping direct the project. "It's truly unique."

In addition to expanding marshlands, the plan would also clean up several riversides' toxic sites, restore forests and remove homes and commercial buildings from flood zones. It will also authorize the construction of a large bypass culvert to shunt floodwaters away from downtown Napa.

The plan has won support from a diverse political coalition that includes the Sierra Club and the Napa Chamber of Commerce.

"Usually you don't even see these people in the same ballpark," said Chris Sauer, an executive member of the Sierra Club who serves as the organization's liaison for the river project.

Not everyone is delighted with the proposed project.

"I basically support Measure A, but I also think it has severe deficiencies," said Marina Drummer, executive director of the LEF Foundation, a St. Helena organization that funds art and environmental projects.

Drummer said some grape growers and winery owners have thrown up berms on their riverside properties, exacerbating downstream flooding.

"The plan doesn't tackle that either, and it's a very serious and growing problem," she said.

There have been some other objections, said Dave Dixon, the county's project manager for the flood control plan.

"Some people on the hills may feel they are paying for a project that won't benefit them directly," he said. "And we also hear that we should've done it 20 years ago when things were less expensive, and that taxes are too high as they are."

Female inmates allegedly raped, beaten

PRISONS: Bureau to tighten harassment policies as prisoners' lawsuit claims guards sold women for sex

The Associated Press

SAN FRANCISCO – The U.S. Bureau of Prisons will tighten its sexual harassment and assault policies nationwide in settling a lawsuit involving three female inmates in California.

The inmates of a federal penitentiary sued, saying they were beaten, raped and sold by guards for sex – and they claimed prison officials knew about it.

The Bureau of Prisons is expanding its sexual harassment training program to provide immediate care for inmates who are sexually assaulted. It will also develop a system of reporting attacks to protect inmates from retaliation.

The bureau has also agreed to stop housing women in the men's unit at Dublin, where the attacks took place.

Under terms of the settlement presented Tuesday, the bureau will pay the three inmates $500,000, to be shared among them. The nation's 110,000 federal inmates also will receive literature on reporting sexual assaults and harassment.

> "There exists no safe and secure method of reporting abuse."
> Michael Bien
> Attorney

The changes will be enforced nationwide at all federal prisons.

"We must be able to monitor what goes on behind the prisons' concrete and steel veil of secrecy," said Geri Lynn Green, an attorney for the plaintiffs. "What happened in this case is precisely the danger posed by a prison system without accountability and independent investigations."

The women – Robin Lucas, Valerie Mercadel and Raquel Douthit – sued prison authorities Aug. 13 in San Francisco, saying officials knew about the attacks but did nothing when they begged for protection.

According to Lucas, the three women were placed in the men's solitary confinement unit for disciplinary problems. There, they suffered humiliation and assaults. They were visible to male inmates and guards at all times, even when using the toilet and shower. And guards let male prisoners into their cells, knowing the men would attack and try to rape the women, Lucas and Mercadel said.

Even though their placement violated prison regulations against mixing sexes, corrections officials ignored the women's requests to

Rap artist arrested for controversial lyrics

TRIAL: Officials say song violates parole, not issue of freedom of speech

By David Kligman
The Associated Press

Upon his parole from prison last year, rapper and convicted felon Shawn Thomas agreed to an order that he do nothing to promote a gang lifestyle. Now Thomas is back in jail, allegedly violating the condition by recording "Til My Casket Drops," an album that encourages the killing of police and other law enforcement officials.

"When they try to pull you over, shoot 'em in the face, y'all," Thomas raps in the song "Deadly Game."

Thomas, who records under the name C-BO, was arrested at his Sacramento home Tuesday without incident, state Department of Corrections spokesman Tip Kendall said. He was taken to the Sacramento County Jail, where he must remain without bail until the State Board of Prison Terms decides whether he violated his parole. In addition, the Sacramento County District Attorney's office will review whether to file criminal charges, Kendall said.

Thomas' attorney, John Duree, called the arrest illegal and said the rapper should not be punished for exercising his free speech rights. "It seems clear that this is constitutionally-protected speech," said Duree, who plans to challenge the arrest in court. "This is the kind of fear that has always motivated censorship."

But authorities claim Thomas' criminal past excludes him from protection under the First Amendment. Kendall said the album's lyrics include threats to the Sacramento County district attorney, the Sacramento sheriff, a police officer and a county probation officer. One song mentions Gov. Pete Wilson and his support of California's "three strikes" law.

"You're talking about a convicted felon who was just released from prison and now he's engaged in wholesale promotion of the gang lifestyle," Kendall told The Associated Press. "The department looked at this as a very serious violation of his parole."

Thomas was convicted of illegal

Thinking About Becoming Involved?

How to make informed and free choice decisions.

College is an environment with many decisions, anxieties and pressures. There are times when you may be homesick, feel unloved or overwhelmed, or believe you will never straighten out your life. Learning to cope with such feelings and keeping them in proper perspective is an opportunity college provides. Yet, it is at these times that high-pressure religious groups tend to seek you out and begin recruiting.

How to Identify High Pressure Groups

Observe the group's responses to you and how you feel. If you can answer "yes" to any three of these statements, you should seriously reconsider your involvement.

- The group seems to be perfect. Everyone agrees and follows all orders cheerfully.
- The group claims to have "all the answers" to your problems.
- You are asked to recruit new members soon after joining.
- You begin to feel guilty and ashamed, unworthy as a person.
- The group encourages you to put their meetings and activities before all other commitments, including studying.
- The group speaks in a derogatory way about your past religious, social or political affiliations.
- Your parents and friends are defined as unable to understand or help you with religious, political or other matters.
- Doubts and questions are seen as signs of weak faith or commitment. You are shunned if you persist in these doubts.
- Leadership of the group is mostly male, and males in general are believed to have different rights and abilities than females.
- You are invited on a retreat with the group, but they can't give you an overview of the purpose, theme or activities before you go.

You are most vulnerable to high pressure groups when..... you are lonely; you are in trouble academically; you are hurting; you are having a tough time socially.

Former top enlisted man gets day in court

ARMY: Defendant visited female officer after hours wearing only gym shorts

By Anne Gearan
The Associated Press

FORT BELVOIR, Va. – Tense and combative under cross-examination, the Army's former top enlisted man testified at his sexual-misconduct trial Wednesday that he saw "nothing inappropriate" about visiting a female aide in her hotel room after midnight while in gym shorts.

Sgt. Maj. Gene McKinney is accused of pressuring six young military women for sex, including Sgt. Maj. Brenda Hoster, who said she was accosted in her Hawaiian hotel room in 1996. McKinney testified that he actually went to her room to fire her for incompetence.

"You went to a female subordinate's room after midnight, in your shorts, after you had been drinking ... for a closed-door meeting to tell her it was time to move on?" Army prosecutor Lt. Col. Michael Child asked during cross-examination.

McKinney, 47, tersely replied that on business trips, hotel rooms double as offices.

"I found nothing inappropriate about that," he said.

The 29-year Army veteran conceded he made no written record of his conversation with Hoster and told nobody else that he wanted to fire her.

Defense attorneys claim McKinney's six accusers are lying for various reasons – in Hoster's case, as payback for the alleged firing. McKinney testified that another accuser may have wanted to get back at him after he admonished her for flirting with him.

McKinney showed flashes of anger several times under cross-examination. He jutted his chin in defiance as the prosecutor sarcastically described the scene in the hotel room.

The prosecutor suggested McKinney was floundering in his job and seeking a scapegoat in Hoster, then his speechwriter.

"Wasn't it a fact that you were in over your head in that assignment, not Sgt. Maj. Hoster?" Child asked.

McKinney bristled. "I don't agree with that, sir," he said.

In five hours of questioning by his own lawyer Tuesday and Wednesday, McKinney was calm and relaxed in denying all 19 charges against him, then rebutting the women's claims point-by-point.

McKinney haltingly described his 26-year marriage and the 1996 death of his only child in an auto accident. Asked about the strength of his marriage to Wilhemina McKinney, he paused, his eyes brimming with tears.

After regaining his composure, he said: "There are a lot of reasons people are successful in this world and I've got to give that to the right people."

His wife, sitting in the front row of the gallery, pulled a tissue from her pocket and dabbed away tears. Several members of the jury glanced at Mrs. McKinney.

She has sat behind him in court each day and was the first witness on his behalf last week. Several of his accusers said McKinney made disparaging remarks about his wife and said he needed comfort from someone else.

"It is absolutely absurd for people to think that I have a poor marriage," McKinney said. Later, he added: "We've had our problems. Doesn't mean that you stop."

McKinney was removed as sergeant major of the Army, the Pentagon advocate for the Army's enlisted ranks, after Hoster made her allegations public 13 months ago. He could get 55 1/2 years in prison if convicted.

Senate votes for stringent nationwide alcohol limits

DRIVING: State rights may be trampled, but bill is still approved

By Jim Abrams
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON – The Senate strongly endorsed tough national standards for determining drunken driving on Wednesday, overcoming opposition from lawmakers who complained that Washington was meddling with state decisions.

"I hope that the happy hour is over for drunk drivers," said Sen. Frank Lautenberg, D-N.J., one of the chief sponsors of the measure. He predicted that the tougher standard could save more than 500 lives a year.

Sen. Mike DeWine, R-Ohio, the other chief sponsor, added: "This problem is much more than a state problem; it's a national tragedy."

Anti-drunk driving groups estimate that in 1996, more than 17,000 of the 40,000 deaths on the nation's high-

Vietnamese-Americans, like most ethnically mixed groups, suffer the pressure to assimilate into the American parent culture. As a result, while we attempt to balance our Vietnamese half with our American half, many of us lose our true sense of self-identity. The 1998 Vietnamese-American Leadership Conference (VALC) will explore the contemporary identity issues which cause us to mistake who we are with who we think we should be. Through open discussions and informative lectures with guest speakers involved in the Vietnamese-American community, VALC 1998 will allow participants to:

* Rediscover our culture and heritage * Become more aware of ethnically-based issues * Re-evaluate career goals to enhance community involvement *

By attending VALC, you will be able to reconcile your native Vietnamese heritage with your American one. As a result of VALC, you will be empowered with the skills to be more active in your culturally mixed community. You will walk away with a desire to preserve and commit yourself to the preservation of our Vietnamese culture. It is only through collective effort that Vietnamese-Americans today can achieve societal influence and reputation.

Israeli president wins second term despite challenge

POLITICS: Big Sephardi contender loses due to his long list of opponents

By Jack Katzenell
The Associated Press

JERUSALEM — Israel's popular president was re-elected to a second five-year term today, defeating a surprisingly strong challenge by a small-town mayor from the ruling Likud Party.

Ezer Weizman won 63 votes in the 120-member parliament, while Shaul Amor, favored by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, received 49 votes. Eight lawmakers did not vote.

Right after the results were announced, Israel TV set up a phone call between Weizman and Netanyahu. "We are going to work together, don't worry," Weizman assured the Israeli premier. "That's right, and I think this is the start of a new era," Netanyahu responded.

During his first term, Weizman, 73, won Israel's heart with his irreverent approach to the ceremonial post and his ability to express the nation's mood during the roller-coaster years of peace accords and suicide bombings.

The Moroccan-born Amor, 57, won more support than expected, emphasizing his ethnic background and saying it was time for a president from the disadvantaged Sephardi community. Many Sephardi Jews – who trace their roots to Middle Eastern countries – still feel resentment toward European-born, or Ashkenazi, Jews.

The legislators started voting in a secret ballot shortly after 11 a.m., and results were announced less than two hours later.

Weizman, of the opposition Labor Party, is a prominent member of Israel's Ashkenazi elite. His uncle, Chaim, was Israel's first president. Ezer Weizman has served as air force commander and defense minister and played a key role in negotiating Israel's peace agreement with Egypt.

But a sharp tongue and a tendency to meddle where he wasn't wanted also won Weizman a long list of enemies on both sides of the Israeli political spectrum.

Leah Rabin, widow of slain prime minister and Labor party leader Yitzhak Rabin, has come out in support of Amor, apparently because she is still angry at Weizman for telling reporters that on the eve of the 1967 war, Rabin – then the army's chief of staff – suffered a nervous breakdown. The story haunted Rabin for the remainder of his career.

Weizman has also angered Netanyahu by publicly prodding him to do more in the Mid-East peace process. When U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright visited Israel last fall, Weizman told her that she should knock heads together to get the stalled negotiations moving again.

Polls suggest the dovish Weizman has the backing of more than 70 percent of the population and Israel TV said his supporters include several key Likud lawmakers.

Israel commentators said they had many misgivings about Weizman, but that Amor was not cut out to be president.

Amor became mayor of Migdal Haemek in 1978, and transformed the northern town plagued by unemployment and crime by attracting high-tech industry.

After two terms as Likud Party backbencher in the parliament, Amor felt he was ripe for high office – but was passed over by Netanyahu for several posts, including that of Cabinet minister and parliament speaker.

Greater visibility of community accompanied by more hate crimes

VIOLENCE: Verbal abuse, physical assault against homosexuals increased

By Donna De La Cruz
The Associated Press

NEW YORK – As the visibility of homosexuals increased last year, so did anti-gay violence and harassment, according to a new report.

A survey released by the National Coalition of Anti-Violence Programs Tuesday found that violence against homosexuals increased by 2 percent nationwide in 1997.

The coalition of gay-advocacy groups attributed the rise to publicity surrounding events such as the February 1997 bombing of a gay and lesbian nightclub in Atlanta and the coming-out episode of the TV show "Ellen."

"Tragically, there appears to be a direct correlation between the community's heightened visibility and an upsurge in violence," said Christine Quinn, executive director of the New York City Gay and Lesbian Anti-Violence Project.

The coalition compiled the report based on statistics obtained from local groups that track crimes against homosexuals, bisexuals and people with blurred sexual identities. The report is not based on police statistics and is not considered comprehensive because it only tracks 14 areas across the country.

But officials of groups within the coalition said the report should be taken seriously.

"Yes, someone should use some caution when looking at this report and not feel it's a complete map of the violence that's happening to us – but you can still draw some conclusions about the trends in violence," said Jennifer Rakowski of Community United Against Violence in San Francisco.

According to the report, there were 2,445 documented cases of anti-gay violence and harassment last year in the 14 areas, which include New York, San Francisco and Los Angeles. The number of murders related to anti-gay violence dropped to 18 in 1997 from 27 in 1996, the report said.

New York City had the most reports of anti-homosexual violence (658), followed by the San Francisco Bay area (402) and Los Angeles (350). More than a third of the cases involved harassment – verbal or by mail or phone. About one-fifth involved assault, and close to a third intimidation.

Among the more brutal examples of harassment include that of a gay Chicago man who reported a year's worth of violent assaults by an elderly neighbor. One night, he said, she attacked him with garden shears, cut him 22 times and yelled "die of AIDS..."

Police response was indifferent to hostility, the report said, with officers once threatening to arrest the victim if he kept complaining. Eventually the neighbor was charged with misdemeanor assault.

New York Police Commissioner Howard Safir said the department has worked closely with the gay and lesbian community "not only to encourage the reporting of bias crimes, but also to help raise awareness of any potential dangers faced by the community."

But Safir added that the report includes figures that were compiled without the use of any uniform or generally accepted method of reporting. He says the New York group "did not attempt to reconcile their figures with those of this department."

The department's figures, based on accounting methods used by the FBI, show that the number of citywide gay bias incidents dropped to 59 in 1997

Biological terrorism threatens security

By Tom Raum
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — While last month's anthrax scare in Las Vegas turned out to be harmless, Americans could face real danger from biological or chemical terrorism, a panel of specialists told a Senate hearing Wednesday.

"The current confrontation with Iraq highlights the potential significance of state support for biological terrorism," said W. Seth Carus, a visiting professor at the government-funded National Defense University.

He suggested it was "certainly possible" that Iraqi President Saddam Hussein might try to orchestrate a terrorist attack within the United States if provoked by U.S. air strikes.

Even more troubling are recent reports of a Russian-made form of a deadly anthrax bacteria said to be resistant to penicillin and all other current vaccines.

Sen. Richard Lugar, R-Ind., has raised the possibility that individual Russian biologists might illicitly sell samples of their work to rogue nations like Iraq.

But the witnesses — all specialists in biological weapons — urged against panic. They said programs are progressing in U.S. cities to combat such threats of at-home terrorism. They also asserted that the dangers are sometimes overstated.

Col. David Franz, deputy commander of the Army's Medical Research and Material Command, suggested that a biological attack in an American city would be difficult to pull off effectively — short of a "very technically competent, well-funded terrorist program."

"There are a lot of hoaxes and lesser threats," he said, urging that public officials "turn down" the volume in talking about the risks.

Franz told the hearing, convened jointly by the Senate Judiciary and Intelligence committees, that some of the most lethal biological substances — such as anthrax, botulinum toxin or Ebola virus — are only deadly if made airborne and inhaled.

Senators stirred uncomfortably when Franz raised the what-if notion that one of those toxins was discovered spilled on the floor under their feet.

"Clean it up with disinfectant and go about our business," he testified.

The third witness before the panel, Dr. Stephen M. Ostroff, an associate director at the National Center for Infectious Diseases, said shipments of potentially hazardous biological materials are coming under increasingly tough scrutiny and regulation.

"Addressing the threat of bioterrorism requires an unprecedented level of cooperation and partnership" among government agencies, he said.

from 61 in 1996.

Speaking for the coalition, Michael Rosano said the police department needs to work very hard to build trust with the gay community.

"People who are victims of bias-related violence will call us before they call the police," said Rosano, director of community organizing and public advocacy for the city's Gay and Lesbian Anti-Violence Project. "There's a level of mistrust of the police among our clients."

The report also found that anti-gay violence was most prevalent in June, the time of year when gay communities nationwide celebrate Pride Month. But the report also blamed the increase on publicity surrounding the February 1997 bombing of The Otherside Lounge in Atlanta, a gay and lesbian nightclub, which injured five people.

And last April's episode of "Ellen" in which TV character Ellen Morgan announces she's a lesbian, contributed to attacks on homosexuals, the report added. Ellen DeGeneres, the actress who portrays the character, is herself a lesbian.

The other 11 cities of areas the coalition tracked were: California's central coast; Chicago; Cleveland and Columbus, Ohio; Washington, D.C.; Detroit; El Paso, Texas; Massachusetts; Phoenix; St. Louis; and Virginia.

The National Coalition of Anti-Violence Programs is a coalition of organizations serving lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and HIV-positive crime victims.

SENATE

ways resulted from alcohol-related accidents.

By a 62-32 margin, the Senate urged states to set a .08 percent blood-alcohol content as the threshold for drunken driving. Currently, 15 states have that standard while 35 states use a more lenient .10 percent.

States that do not accept the tougher standard would lose 5 percent of their federal highway money in fiscal 2002, and 10 percent after that.

Support for the new standard crossed party lines, with 26 Republicans — including stalwart conservatives such as Sens. Jesse Helms and Lauch Faircloth of North Carolina — joining 36 Democrats.

President Clinton, who had pressed for passage, thanked the Senate for acting and urged the House to follow suit. "It will save hundreds of lives each year," he said at the White House.

The drunken driving measure was presented as an amendment to a $173 billion, six-year highway funding bill. Coming up was another highly contentious amendment that would seek to end a program giving 10 percent of construction contracts to women and minorities.

"The first battle for a national uniform .08 law has been won," said Judith Lee Stone, president of Advocates for Highway and Auto Safety. "We now take our fight to the halls of the House of Representatives."

In the House, which has yet to take up the transportation funding bill, Rep. Nita Lowey, D-N.Y., said she will introduce a similar amendment.

The national standard was generally opposed by the alcohol and restaurant industries, which contended that .08 percent was too low. In the Senate, the main opposition was from lawmakers who argued that states should have the right to set their own standards and be guided toward tougher standards through encouragement rather than punishment.

"This is a heavy stick. This is a dagger that says you have to do it," said Senate Republican Whip Don Nickles of Oklahoma. "We are trampling on states rights and encouraging this idea that if there is a problem there's a federal solution and we won't give you your money back."

But DeWine said it made no sense for a driver to be legally intoxicated in one state but not in another. "There should be some assurance that there's a minimum standard no matter where you drive in this country," he said.

Supporters said the .08 level was not too stringent, representing the blood-alcohol content when a 170-pound man has four drinks in an hour, or a 137-pound woman has three.

Before completing the massive highway bill, the Senate is also expected to take up amendments that would impose restrictions on driving with an opened alcoholic drink and selling alcoholic beverages at drive-thru outlets.

It must also deal with the issue of how much funding to allot to mass transit. The Senate Banking Committee last fall agreed on $35 billion over six years. Committee chairman Sen. Alfonse D'Amato, R-N.Y., says he wants to add another $4.5 billion when it comes to the floor.

Congress passed a temporary highway funding bill after failing to agree on a long-term bill when the old act expired last October. The temporary bill, which provided $5.5 billion in funding, expires May 1.

about an experiment she did when she moved into Rieber Hall her first year.

Dana Evans, a representative from the African Student Union, said she usually makes the effort to initiate a relationship. But when she moved into Reiber, she decided to not approach other students on her floor as a test to see how many would come to her.

Evans found that no one made an effort to make friends with her, while they knocked on others' doors and invited them to go out.

She said the experiment taught her that when people haven't been exposed to other cultures and only have stereotypes as references, they don't "know how to react."

"They just needed me to come up to them and be like 'I'm cool, I'm alright,'" Evans said. "As a black person, or as any other minority, you have to put yourself out there sometimes and say it's OK."

Concerning existing boundaries between people, Evans mentioned the segregation of groups on campus. She admitted that separation could be explained by the need for students in a huge campus to find people to relate with. However, she also said it shouldn't stop there.

"Once we get into those groups we have to start bridging over gaps," Evans said. "We could do it on the personal level, like I can walk across campus and stop at where all the Persians are or at the steps where all the Asians are and say hi to my friends. The only way to really to do it is to have sessions like this where we can put things on the table, and start from there."

Jason Lo, a fourth-year political science student and peer educator laid out two steps to follow. The first is to "conquer our own racism and sexism" and the second is to do something, when witnessing others committing acts that contribute to inequality.

The group agreed that coming to grips with one's own fears and stereotypes, as well as being educated about other cultures, were important aspects of conquering inequality.

After reaching that conclusion, Thomas then threw in the idea of using friendship by reading a quote from "The Vision of Race Unity," a statement produced by the National Spiritual Assembly of the Baha'is of the United States.

The statement says that "both groups must understand that no real change will come about without close association, fellowship and friendship among diverse people."

Several students on the panel responded to the passage by saying that it takes more than friendship.

"I can associate all day with someone but when we start to talk about issues, we can be very different," said Cori Shepherd, a second-year international and developmental studies student and member of ASU.

She added that education would allow others to understand the histories and struggles of other peoples.

Nicole Presley, a member of the African Women's Collective, added that friendship is just a starting point, but it can't solve things alone.

"Inequality will still exist regardless of who your friends are because your situations are still different," Presley said.

At the end of the discussion, a member of the audience questioned introducing one's self in terms of background and not as a human being. Panelists responded by saying history was relevant because it shapes a person and helps others understand where that person is coming from.

One student brought up the point that reaching equality doesn't mean everyone must be the same.

"I don't want to come to a state where I'm not recognized as a black woman. I'm proud of who I am," Shepherd said. "The ideal situation is when my community can understand this community and work together and say it's OK, that we don't have to talk the same."

Perhaps Lo put the conclusion of the evening best when he said, "Unity means to agree to disagree."

use of a firearm for a 1994 shooting that led to the death of one man during a confrontation with rival gang members. "He could continue to be a rap artist, just not get involved in the gang lifestyle," Kendall said. "Apparently he chose to ignore that."

Thomas was charged Tuesday with threatening public officials, promoting violence against public officials, promoting a gang lifestyle, criminal behavior and violence against law enforcement. He also was charged with traveling beyond a 50-mile limit without approval when he went to the San Francisco Bay area to record "Til My Casket Drops." The album is scheduled to be released next week by Fairfield-based AWOL Records.

Duree claims his client has worked to turn his life around and has not associated with gang members since his release from prison. "He recorded music. That's all he did," Duree said. "He's married, he has a child, his wife is pregnant. He's been earning a decent living. He's not in that kind of lifestyle."

HARASSMENT

return to their cells, she said.

Lucas said things got even worse after she complained to prison officials.

On Sept. 22, 1995, three male prisoners unlocked her cell door in the middle of the night, handcuffed her, raped her and nearly beat her unconscious, she said.

They threatened to attack her again if she kept complaining, Lucas said.

Mercadel, 31, told a similar story, saying male inmates let into her cell by a guard hit and threatened her.

When she told investigators, they said they had heard similar complaints and said, "We should just let it die down," Mercadel said.

"There exists no safe and secure method of reporting abuse. Meanwhile, there has been a steady erosion of prisoners' access to the courts, legal representation and the press," attorney Michael Bien said. "These attacks and the resulting retaliation occurred because we have a prison system that is accountable to no one."

Dr. Peter Carlson, regional director for the western region of the Federal Bureau of Prisons, said many provisions in the settlement are not new. The agreement simply tightens up policies that have been in existence and worked well for quite some time, he said.

"We have always taken allegations of malfeasance against inmates very seriously," he said. "We always get them investigated, either by our own office of internal affairs or the Inspector General or the FBI."

The new procedures will require more work, "but as a signatory to this, I think it's probably the right thing to do," Carlson said. "It's an abundance of caution we're adopting in this procedure."

Our distinguished faculty facilitate classes limited to just 15 students, and our full- or part-time programs feature convenient evening class times. Knowing all that, the only sensible thing to do now is to call Chapman University right away.

observation he made last week in delivering his semiannual report to Congress on monetary policy.

He said the impact of the Asian crisis so far has been modest with no signs of the types of imbalances that could trigger a recession, even though the current expansion begins its ninth year this month, the third longest period of uninterrupted growth in history.

Normally, at this advanced stage of a recovery, Greenspan said, the economy would begin showing signs of imbalances, such as rising inflation. But this time, he said, inflation is falling and no other imbalances are evident.

"Contrary to historic experience, instead of imbalances arising, (the economy) is becoming increasingly benign," he said. "There is a sense of tranquillity and confidence."

she said. At dinner Monday, nearly 20 of them ventured to Rieber and found the one table that could seat all of them. After the plates were cleaned and the dessert bar scavenged for treats, the teasing began.

The jokes continued with students poking fun at each other's addictions to a video game called Puzzlefighter and The Jerry Springer Show.

A crowded room is a common occurrence for Liening, who reminded her neighbors after a post-dinner gathering that they were welcome to stay even after she left for a special appointment, her weekly visit with a homeless man in Westwood.

"Just don't mess my stuff up," she called behind her as she left the room.

As a member of BCF, Liening has tried to carry the year's focus of loving the poor over into her own life. This challenge has manifested itself into weekly visits with Steven, a 75-year-old homeless man who lives in Westwood.

Since the first week during fall quarter, Liening has periodically visited Steven, buying food, bringing gifts of clothing and simply enjoying conversation.

"It started in the fall. Some friends and I went to dinner. Afterwards, we broke into groups and hunted down the homeless," she recalled.

Since that first visit, Liening and her friend Shawn Tellez, a first-year undeclared student, have "hunted" Steven down in Westwood several times.

"He really talks your ear off. He just won't stop talking," Liening said. "But he really recognizes us and remembers our names. He may not be all there, but I know he appreciates it."

Monday, Liening and Tellez took a brisk walk to the Coffee Bean on Westwood in hopes of finding their white-bearded friend. When the alley behind the coffee shop was found empty, they hurried over to the Gypsy Cafe and found him upstairs.

After a quick stop at Diddy Riese for four chocolate chip cookies, the three sat down to catch up. Steven began remembering a windy March in 1984 and told stories of life in New York and the time he "discovered" the fireplace at North Campus.

Of all of her activities, the one that most fills Liening's schedule, besides her 12-hour work week at the front desk, is her commitment to Bible study and faith sharing.

This quarter, she attends several Bible studies, including one that focuses on the Book of Genesis and a group that she leads for non-Christians once each week in her room.

"It's us trying to unpack it and figure out what it means," she said, describing the challenges faced by the members of her Genesis group, which is a part of the InterVarsity program at UCLA.

Liening said that meeting with Steven gives her a chance for her own self-exploration and that she sees images of God in the homeless.

"There's something about Steven's character that really makes me think," she said. "And I think I can see Jesus in (the homeless) more than a lot of other people. When I'm around him, there's a sort of self-evaluation. It's good to be around poor people. It makes me realize how rich I am."

RULING

of a football coach smacking the fanny of a player who's heading onto the field. Nothing illegal there, Scalia said, but that's not necessarily the case when the coach does the same thing to his secretary, male or female.

He said concerns that Title VII will become "a general civility code for the American workplace" are misguided.

"That risk is no greater for same-sex than for opposite-sex harassment, and is adequately met by careful attention to the requirements of the statute," Scalia said.

He added: "Title VII does not prohibit all verbal or physical harassment in the workplace; it is directed only at discrimination because of sex," Scalia said. "The critical issue ... is whether members of one sex are exposed to disadvantageous terms or conditions of employment to which members of the other sex are not exposed."

In the Louisiana case, a federal appeals court ruled as it threw out Joseph Oncale's lawsuit that the federal law never applies to same-sex harassment.

His sexual-harassment claim stemmed from four months of work in 1991 as a roustabout assigned to a Gulf of Mexico oil rig with Sundowner Offshore Services.

Oncale's lawsuit against Sundowner and three men said he was sexually assaulted, battered, touched and threatened with rape by his direct supervisor, John Lyons, and a second supervisor, Danny Pippen. Another defendant, coworker Brandon Johnson, was accused of assisting in one of the alleged incidents.

Oncale, who now lives in a small town near Baton Rouge, said he twice reported the situation to his employer's highest-ranking representative on the job site, but no action was taken. He said he quit because he feared the harassment would escalate to rape. All three men named as defendants portrayed their conduct as hazing or locker-room horseplay.

The Supreme Court's decision allows Oncale to take his lawsuit to a jury but does not ensure his ultimate victory.

Justice Clarence Thomas wrote a one-paragraph statement in which he said he joined the court ruling because it made clear there must be proof of "discrimination because of sex."

Thomas' 1991 Supreme Court confirmation hearing was marked by sensational allegations of sexual harassment.

THE RAPE OF NANKING
An Evening with Iris Chang

Monday, March 9 7:30 pm

In December 1937, in what was then the capital of China, one of the most brutal massacres in the long annals of wartime barbarity occurred. The Japanese army swept into the ancient city of Nanking and within weeks not only looted and burned the defenseless city but systematically raped, tortured, and murdered more than 300,000 Chinese civilians.

Author Iris Chang, whose own grandparents barely escaped the massacre will give a gripping, meticulously researched account which continues to be denied by the Japanese government.

THE POL POT REGIME
Race, Power, and Genocide in Cambodia Under the Khmer Rouge, 1975-79

Sunday, March 15 7:30 pm

The Khmer Rouge revolution turned Cambodia into grisly killing fields, as the Pol Pot regime murdered or starved to death a million and a half of Cambodia's eight million inhabitants.

This comprehensive study of the Pol Pot regime describes the violent origins, social context, and course of the revolution, and provides a new answer to the question of why a group of Cambodian intellectuals imposed genocide on their own country.

Ben Kiernan is Associate Professor of History and director of the Cambodian Genocide Program at Yale University.

Association. He will also serve as a representative to the UC Board of Regents, the office of the president, the UCLA Alumni Association, and both state and federal legislatures.

Some of Ong's other duties will include advocacy of graduate student issues, legislative and university policy review and general public relations.

The first week of winter quarter, the GSA Assembly held a special mail vote to determine who would replace Chee, who resigned effective February 11 due to medical leave. Ong, running unopposed, received 68 of the 72 votes turned in, and took office March 4.

Ong's previous experience includes working with UCLA Student Affairs for the past three years, as well as being an executive director of the International Student Orientation Program and a departmental representative for the School of Public Health.

Ong sees diversity as affecting all students and plans to focus on how it touches individual students.

"There are still a lot of diversity issues going on these days," said Ong.

"Diversity has the power to bring us together. It can really open our minds to a lot of things, but if we're not that open minded, it has the potential to cause a lot of conflicts," he said.

Ong also supports forming a union of graduate and professional students as one way to protect their rights.

"The administration doesn't believe in the idea of graduate students being able to unionize and work as a collective bargaining tool," said Ong. "My personal belief is they do have the right to do so."

During her two years in office, Chee's policies also included advocating union recognition of graduate and professional organizations. Chee said some of her main goals included this, as well as educating students on affirmative action and trying to preserve it in higher education admissions.

Overall, Chee feels she was able to achieve many of her goals during her time in office.

"It was an honor, a large and powerful responsibility and I feel that I accomplished a great deal in that role," she said.

Some of Chee's accomplishments include helping organize precinct walks, voter registration drives and phone banking drives to fight Proposition 209. She also organized the first graduate and professional student orientation.

Ong hopes to continue with Chee's goals while moving toward his own plans for office.

"We're in a transition phase," said Ong. "We're still talking about some of the issues she was interested in and the issues I'm interested in."

After Chee announced her resignation, Ong was the only candidate for the office who completed the steps necessary to put his name on the ballot. This included being nominated by 50 graduate and professional students.

"Our advertising plan was kind of bad," said GSA President Andrew Westall, when asked why only one candidate joined the election.

"The responsibilities of the position take a lot of time. It involves traveling a lot and you need a lot of rescheduling," he continued.

"I felt that I could really motivate people into getting involved and making changes," said Ong. "When the position opened up, I decided that I really wanted to run."

Media Four and the alumni committee member in charge of Entertainment Night. Many of the alumni present at the event were obtained through Sauer's connections.

This was the third year the association put out this event and each year, it has grown bigger and bigger. "Last year, we had about 500 students who showed up. I hoped there would be a bigger turnout this year, but I didn't imagine we would draw over 850 students," Wolf said. It was hosted by the Student Alumni Association, who had been planning for the event since last November.

Most of the students emerged from the Ackerman Grand Ballroom with smiles on their faces and new knowledge in their heads. "It's the best networking opportunity on campus," said Brett Levisohn, a fifth-year student majoring in Communication Studies.

"They gave the inside info on how to get in, how to stay in and how to work your way up," added Tritia Cantun, a third-year sociology student.

The event was also a positive experience for the alumni who participated. "It's a great way to reconnect the alumni back to the university," said Cindy Chernow, the director of Alumni Career Services and the association's advisor. "No matter how high up you become, you always enjoy coming back to talk to the students."

Indonesia's worst economic turmoil in three decades began when the currency, the rupiah, plunged in value last year, pushing up prices and unemployment in the nation of 202 million.

Protesters said Suharto is to blame.

"Suharto is the mastermind of the crisis," said Pedro Viera, a student at the prestigious Gadjah Mada University in Yogyakarta, 310 miles east of Jakarta.

The Yogyakarta students also appealed for the government to take action against ethnic violence. Chinese merchants, a minority who dominate commerce in Indonesia, have been targeted in the riots over soaring food prices.

Human rights groups accuse the government of doing little to protect the Chinese. In a speech last weekend, Suharto warned against such scapegoating arguments.

to pursue their primary missions, UCLA will be able to do expand their services geographically into the downtown area, allowing them to provide clinical services to underserved populations.

This will further expand UCLA's commitment to community-based health care. Currently, UCLA supports 43 community clinics.

Not only will UCLA be able to extend its clinical services to the downtown area but the Orthopaedic hospital will relocate its inpatient services to the Santa Monica/UCLA Medical Center by 2003.

"Through this alliance we will save about $5 million in operating expenses," said Dr. James V. Luck, president and director of the Orthopaedic Hospital.

"By combining our inpatient activities, we will save an enormous amount of money that we can then apply to children's programs, education and research," Luck said.

According to Luck, priorities of the Orthopaedic Hospital include public service to underserved populations, specifically children, education and research.

Within this alliance, both UCLA and the Orthopaedic hospital will remain independent financially but will work together to serve the needs of their patient population.

Finerman said that one of the reasons behind the alliance is to develop a better program.

"With these types of resources our goal is to become the best program in the U.S.," he said.

The alliance will also allow the two institutions to combine their research facilities.

While at UCLA, research in orthopedics focuses more on the molecular level and research at the hospital focuses on the structural engineering aspects of bone.

"By combining our research efforts in musculoskeletal disorders ... it greatly enhances both of our capacity to deal with these problems (and) our educational programs will be greatly enhanced," Luck said.

With final plans in the works, officials are hoping for the best.

"We were looking for a partnership with an institution that had a compatible mission and was truly a win-win for both sides," Luck said.

"We believe that when this alliance is fully implemented in the early part of the next century, we will have the finest research operations in the world in orthopedics," Levey said.

GONDA

students felt was necessary.

According to association board member and finance committee chair Lung-Chi Lee, ASUCLA wanted the contract because the Gonda building is a part of UCLA and the association wants to maintain a dominant market share on campus.

"We want it for strategic reasons," Lee said. "The association has always been a part of UCLA and if UCLA starts moving to other venues, it looks bad."

Nonetheless, ASUCLA has privatized many of its food services in Ackerman Union, including recent contracts with Rubio's Baja Grill and La Cucina, an Italian restaurant.

According to its five-year plan to restore its financial strength, ASUCLA was supposed to start putting aside money next year. Now that money will go to financing the Gonda project. But Eastman said that there would be a greater risk if the students' association did not operate the restaurant.

"The risk to our five-year plan would be if we don't do it, because of loss of market share," Eastman said.

"I'm confident that this project will have a financial return that will pay back the capital investment," she said. "If we don't operate this restaurant someone else will, and that someone else will make a profit at our expense."

Eastman said that ASUCLA is aiming to attract researchers from all over campus, not just people working within the Gonda building.

"The design for the restaurant is based on tying in with the architecture of the building and making it a very upscale, inviting environment that we hope will draw researchers from other on campus facilities," Eastman said.

The Gonda center will open in October 1998.

because more than 70 percent of the 2,979 congress delegates are party members.

Zeng Jianhui, a legislative spokesman, said the shakeup was needed to curb overstaffing and official interference in the management of companies, adapting the government to an economy radically altered by nearly two decades of market-orientated reforms.

Li, who must by law step down from the premiership after serving two five-year terms, is expected to take over Qiao's job on March 16, three days before the session ends. Congress leaders and deputies also serve for five-year stints but face no term limits.

Outside the party, Li is disliked for declaring martial law before the military assault on democracy demonstrators on Tiananmen Square in 1989. Dissidents released a flurry of petitions in the past two weeks calling him unqualified to head the legislature. Police have arrested at least three petitioners.

Qiao, who many credit with trying to make the largely rubber-stamp legislature more powerful, was No. 3 in the party hierarchy until he lost a power struggle in September. In public, however, the leadership has taken care to appear united.

Qiao and Li "shook hands cordially" today at the meeting of senior officials, the state-run Xinhua News Agency reported. Qiao and other members of the outgoing legislature left the room to "warm applause," leaving Li in control of the meeting, the report said.

"I have accomplished my mission," Xinhua quoted Qiao as saying. "I'm taking my leave."

Zeng played down the end of Qiao's chairmanship, saying China has abolished life tenure for officials and that it was "perfectly normal" that the 73-year-old was not re-elected.

"His is not an isolated case. There are quite a few leaders of the old generation who enjoyed high prestige who have already retired," he said.

Qiao, who reportedly said during a recent visit to Hong Kong that he planned to remain active in politics, could still wield influence behind the scenes.

Tian Jiyun, a senior legislator and Qiao ally whose fate also has been in question, was put in charge of handling day-to-day operations of the annual session – a possible signal that he will be kept on as the legisla-

Undergrad scholarships

Thumbs up to Lew Wasserman, who has pledged to donate $8.75 million to UCLA for undergraduate scholarships. Saying he wants to provide poor students with the college education he could never afford, the chairman emeritus of Universal Studios is also giving $300,000 to support the Geffen Playhouse and turning over his $700,000 weekend home along with a $250,000 maintenance fund, bringing the total to $10 million.

Lobby letters to Congress

Thumbs up to UC Berkeley students and students from other UC campuses for initiating a letter drive to Congress last week to lobby for an increase in financial aid.

Members from the California Public Interest Research Group on seven of the nine UC campuses organized the letter-writing campaign. Members explained that they would send letters and videotaped messages to Rep. John Kasich, R-Ohio, chair of the House Budget Committee.

In the letter, students asked Kasich to take a series of steps to "protect access to higher education."

The letter asked for more funds for graduate fellowships, a decrease in student-loan costs and a raise in the maximum for a Pell Grant to $3,400 for the 1999 fiscal year.

School police have shotguns

Thumbs down to the Los Angeles unified School District board, which voted 5-2 to buy shotguns because school police have said their patrols often take them into gang and crime-ridden neighborhoods. The district will purchase 75 12-gauge Remington shotguns, which the police will receive within the next two months. The shotguns will be locked in patrol cars while officers are on foot patrol. The officers will receive 16 hours of training.

It's frightening to think school police officers need to arm themselves with shotguns.

Small quirks of the place we call home

LOS ANGELES: Lunacy never ceases in city of glamour, extravagance

Amy Turner

I've been a woman in Los Angeles for quite some time now, and I've discovered that in this place where Visa bills serve as Rorshach tests, life gets stinky, and one forgets how to smell the roses (well, it's hard to smell anything after visiting the plastic surgeon for that final rhinoplasty). I like being a woman, a lot. It's just that sometimes I realize that I'm part of the set design, creating the next shot in the appropriate attire, and I swear it's because I'm living in Los Angeles. I walk through movie premiers to get to my car parked in the lot behind In-N-Out burger; I accidentally date actors; I am drowning in entertainment hooey.

I've been a woman in a number of places, some where the use of lip-liner throws one into the ranks of cosmopolitan. Here, in the land of the blown-out shag hair and the cookie-cutter decaf smile, I wonder what it takes to survive, to be unscathed by Hollywood and its boring definitions of "hip." I see women who go pick up their kids from Montessori schools in their Range Rovers. I see the others with puffy pink dreams of a film career like Sandra Bullock's who wind up smashed on speed instead of starring in it. I see it all, and sometimes I can hardly step into my frilly panties in the morning because I'm not sure I'm good at being a woman in Los Angeles.

> Here, in the land of the blown-out shag hair and the cookie-cutter decaf smile, I wonder what it takes to survive.

This mecca of iconoclasm does have some lovely amenities. I found the Beverly Hills Library and became giddy with the extravagance of the place; marble and dark woods make me tremble. I went there last week and tried to fight the feeling that my life was one big, cliche-ridden sitcom plot without any good sponsors. I picked up an application for membership and began filling out the form. I began to eavesdrop on the conversation in front of me. There stood a woman with biologically impossible breasts, purple-glitter toenails, legs to the rafters shoved (like as in with a shoe horn) into hot pants and a cropped haircut. She was asking the grayish, polyester-clad librarian a multitude of questions. Standing there, blinded by the glaring contrast of these two women, it became clear to me that the library should issue some really snazzy Armani suits to the employees, for continuity's sake (you've got to see how classy this library is). So I'm hypnotized by this woman with legs like chopsticks and I notice how her voice has a naturally paced sense of eloquence and dignity. With royal elocution, she says, "So, do you have anything with the title, 'How to Marry a Millionaire' or, let's see, maybe just 'How to Marry Rich?'"

She smiled a detergent-white smile, and I turned my face to the membership form to hide my disbelief. Her diction was so refined I had to have heard her correctly. Whoa. Those words, they don't exist in my idealized little world (a place full of Elvis paraphernalia and men who live for foreplay and cooking with fresh herbs). I was lost, and I looked to the librarian for help.

U.N. treatment of Iraq equals genocide

SANCTIONS: Students need to get involved to help stop horrific truth

By Ahmed Shama

So the bombing didn't take place in Iraq this time around. Now we can all rest assured that innocent people won't be killed, right? Nothing can be further from the truth. There is an issue far more pressing, far more torturous and far more inhumane than the bombing of Iraq. Under the facade of a simple blockade, U.N. sanctions have managed to kill millions and cripple an entire population.

"How can sanctions be so deadly?" the innocent bystander may ask. It doesn't seem to make sense that placing sanctions on a country can cause more havoc on a people than bombing. Bombing is more visible and receives more media attention. When we see a picture of a building being bombed in Iraq, we imagine how many people might have been killed or injured in such an attack. Sanctions, however, do not provide a graphic image or a concrete idea of how they are affecting the intended target.

Well, since 1991, seven years of sanctions on Iraq – which were intended to place pressure on Saddam Hussein – have proven to be deadlier than most wars in the 20th century. Meanwhile, the tyrannical dictator Saddam Hussein enjoys a complacent life in any one of his eight palaces in Iraq. The point is clear: the sanctions against Iraq have completely missed their target.

The statistics are startling. 1.5 million civilians have been killed since 1991 directly because of U.N. sanctions. 560,000 of those killed are children. If you can't picture how much 560,000 lives is, that's more Iraqi children killed because of U.N. sanctions than Japanese because of the atomic bombs and Bosnians because of "ethnic cleansing" combined. And each one of those was a genocide. Currently, 4,500 children die every month. Do your math, and that means that one child dies every 10 minutes. What we are dealing with here is not a conflict between the United States and a Middle East country. We are dealing with a genocide.

That's the message that students have been trying to educate the campus about on Bruin Walk this last week. Unfortunately, some passersby are not too open to the message. In their rush to class, they may give only a slight glance, or perhaps even take a flyer, only to throw it away a few steps later. How could we possibly face a

Only capitalism upholds individual rights

GOVERNMENT: Regimes of communism evoke oppression on its people

By Matthew Gever

A group of students gather in a public square in order to protest the brutal, oppressive government that they are forced to live under. The government responds to this by opening fire and killing most of these students. Which government is this? The communist government of the People's Republic of China.

The PRC, like every communist regime that has come to power, has imposed death and human suffering in the name of the collective good. In fact, communism can lead to nothing other than tyranny and oppression. It has been tried and tested on every continent of the world, and each time it has been a miserable failure, leading to famine, poverty, mass killings and torture, and imperialism.

> Communism (deprives) an individual of his or her liberty.

The massacre at Tiananmen Square is only one of many examples of how communist governments turn into repressive regimes. Communism cannot function without tyranny. The whole essence of communism is to deprive an individual of his or her liberty and to force the individual into working for the state. People are subjected to government control.

Communist governments have advocated the abolition of all rights, the expropriation of all property, torture, executions without trail, slave-labor camps and mass slaughter. How can anyone look at the bullet-riddled bodies of those try-

U.S. mustn't emulate socialism's spotted record

IDEOLOGY: From Cuba to China, nations without democracy abuse citizens

By Ryan Donlon

Leave it to the Daily Communist, oops, I mean the Daily Bruin, to print an article such as Michelle Oberman's anachronistic "Social rebellion could right wrongs of U.S. conquest" in Monday's Viewpoint section.

Michelle, your naiveté is almost cute in a certain way – but alas, your profound asininity makes me nauseous. I will attempt to address your rambling diatribe of the United States, but hopefully in an effort to do so, my response won't sound as disconcerted as your vitriolic manifesto.

You begin by referring to Desert Storm and the subsequent economic/military embargo as "U.S. Imperialism," but answer this simple question: what does the United States stand to gain from an embargo of Iraq? The sanctions are not self-serving, but instead are aimed at ridding the Middle East of a destabilizing factor, namely Saddam Hussein. The United States doesn't benefit economically by sanctioning Iraq; on the contrary, it is at great cost that the United States maintains its presence in the Persian Gulf region.

Next, you refer to imperialism as "a stage of capitalism," etc. (Blah blah blah, fill in your own acrimonious tirade here.) It's good to see that you've been reading your propaganda literature, specifically Vladimir Lenin's "State and Revolution," in which he describes the method for attaining the perfect communist state through overthrowing the bourgeoisie capitalists. Sounds very romantic until you see what really happened. Lenin's successor, Joseph Stalin, kills millions and places millions more in Siberian work (read: death) camps because they might pose a threat to his authority and the security of the Soviet Union.

If you truly believe that a socialist revolution is the answer to the world's ills, I have a couple of friends who survived the first socialist movement whom you should speak with: Miklosh Sule, for example, who fled Soviet-occupied Hungary when he was 18 to avoid conscription. Miklosh tells me about his aunts and uncles who were relieved of all their earthly possessions; some were murdered for their political beliefs. He left all he had behind and spent a year in a corrupt, Austrian refugee camp before obtaining a visa to enter the United States. Or how about my friend Andrei Verona, whose parents fled Romania after witnessing their neighbors being rounded up from their homes and taken away, never to be heard from again.

How can you subscribe to such an ideology which, upon even cursory examination of its history, is filled with murder and subjugation? Just look at the nations who remain communist: Cuba, North Korea and China. People flee Cuba on small rafts rather than remain in those dis-

Netanyahu needs to act to end Hussein's threats

IRAQ: Israel must attack first to ensure long-term survival in Middle East

By Michael Rader
Brown Daily Herald

While I was living in Jerusalem last year, a crisis erupted between Israel and Syria. President Hafez Assad declared that if the Netanyahu government was not willing to abide by late Prime Minister Rabin's alleged concessions on the Golan Heights, Syria would take back the region by force. Assad deployed commando units, tanks and artillery on Israel's border, and escalated his support of Hezbollah in Lebanon. Israel, in turn, beefed up its Golan defenses and prepared for the possibility of all-out war with Syria.

The public took this crisis seriously, but I remember wondering why no one bothered to update their gas masks or create a "sealed room." After all, the entire world knows that Syria possesses chemical and biological weapons, and the missiles and bombs to deliver them.

Both the U.N. inspectors and Israeli security sources doubt whether Iraq, on the other hand, still has the capability to drop poisons on Tel Aviv – and yet, in the past two weeks millions of Israelis have prepared themselves for just that eventuality. Gas-mask distribution centers have been processing over 20,000 orders per day, and the defense minister has suggested that citizens prepare sealed rooms.

Why the change in attitude? The answer is simple. Israelis still see Syria's leadership as at least minimally rational and relatively modest in its

I half expected her to give the gold-digger-in-training the same look she saved for little boys caught looking at topless natives in National Geographic, but she didn't. Without batting a gray eyelash she typed the words into the computer and said, "Do you know the author's name?" and the woman shook her 1978 Vidal Sassoon haircut from side to side in a helpless, well-rehearsed fashion.

"Ginnie Polo Sayles."

The librarian looked up and said, "What, Dear?" and I stood there, catatonic. Suffocating and stuck sharing the air with the fact that I not only knew the author of the book, but that I had admitted it in a public place – I was nauseous. For a moment, it kind of just floated there, kind of like Ginnie herself, all bright and garish.

"Uhh ... I was just listening and, umm, what exactly is it that you're looking for?" I said meekly.

"How to Marry a Millionaire," said the statuesque woman facing me with all her wide-eyed hopes of future Prada and spa treatments.

"Yeah, uh, that's what I thought you said, I umm, well I watch a lot of bad talk shows, and I ..." this is the part where embarrassed babble begins at the back of my throat and begins to froth up until I am nothing but a verbally rabid female Woody Allen. Shrugging my shoulders in a million staccato gestures I make excuses for three minutes, and I am still explaining the talk-show fixation.

"I watch bad stuff, like Geraldo and Sally. Jerry Springer mostly; anyway, they always have this topic on and ummm ... " Oh holy "A" in women's studies last quarter, what am I doing? Have I turned my back on Naomi, lit the halls of Betty Friedan aflame by answering this woman's question?

"This woman, this Ginnie Polo Sayles, is always on promoting her book. She always wears a red suit; I've seen her on, like, five shows, and she always has the same suit on, but anyway, she's the author you're looking for – Ginnie Polo Sayles."

I breathe through my nose and accept that I have no dignity left. My

I'm sure the librarian is envisioning me in a Lazy Boy recliner with a legal pad jotting down notes from the Richard Bey show while the Malibu Barbie creature is pitying my flat hair and matching chest.

The librarian types in the name and gives the woman the call number. The gold digger gives me a "Hey I'll be thanking you when I'm doing Christmas at St. Barts" look, and I sort of smile.

"Thank you." she says.

"Sure," I mumble. Yeah, you're welcome lady, be a prisoner to Chanel boots, I'm just trying to get a library card. I step up to turn in my application.

"You need proof of residence. And you need to turn this in over there, in the registration line," sighs the librarian.

"Oh, OK, thanks." I stammer and ing to flee East Berlin, or of the protesters in Tiananmen Square, and still believe that socialism will bring about the emancipation of mankind?

In addition to political repression, socialism has brought economic paralysis and collapse to every country that has tried it. For every country that has been through a socialist revolution, famine has immediately followed. This was the case in the Soviet Union, in the PRC and in Cuba. The people of these countries have existed in poverty and misery, which led to the collapse of the Soviet Union and which will lead to the collapse of every socialist state.

Imperialism has also been a uniting factor in communist countries. The Soviet Union invaded Eastern Europe and imposed its will onto it. It later tried, and failed, to invade Afghanistan. China continues its occupation of Tibet, even while relentlessly threatening Taiwan.

If one wishes to espouse the idea of a free society, one must recognize individual rights. Without individual rights, no liberty can exist. The only system that can uphold individual rights is capitalism. The essence of capitalism is for people to pursue their rational self-interests in absence of any government interference. The government plays a minimal role in life, existing only to protect one's life, liberty and property. Individuals are free to make choices and judgments in the absence of force.

It has only been in capitalist societies that humankind has existed without tyranny and misery. A capitalist society has never experienced a famine, nor has it ever had its citizens executed on political grounds. This only results from government exceeding its power. Capitalism does not give government the power to institute force. Imperialism is a result of excess government authority, as seen in the aforementioned examples of China and the Soviet Union. That is what a socialist revolution will bring: imperialism and oppression. It is ironic how people such as Michelle Oberman believe that a system whose whole essence is to deprive individuals of their freedom is going to liberate humankind. Since when is giving the government complete authority to do as they please a path to liberation?

Communism only results in the deprivation of liberty and in human suffering. It is only through capitalism that people will be free to pursue happiness in the absence of oppression. Viva Ayn Rand!

objectives. Despite the fact that Syria supports terrorist activities, its own border with Israel has been completely quiet since 1973. Not a shot has been fired there since the Yom Kippur War, and for all his bluster Assad has never again provoked the Israel Defense Forces into direct combat with the Syrian army.

Saddam Hussein, on the other hand, hit deep into the "Zionist entity" with his scud missiles during the 1991 Gulf War. Few Israelis doubt that Saddam, who is singularly unafraid of retaliation and utterly uncaring for his country or his people, would use non-conventional weapons against Israel at the first available opportunity. President Clinton agreed with this estimation in a recent press conference.

Experience indicates that Israel and Clinton are right. Non-conventional warfare has become a staple of Saddam's survival. Chemical weapons played a key role by terrorizing enemy troops during his eight-year war with Iran, and they enabled him to wipe out the Kurdish opposition in northern Iraq as well. Estimates of the number of Kurds killed in chemical attacks exceed 100,000.

Since deterrence seems unlikely to work against Saddam, Israel's only real choice is to eliminate the threat preemptively. This means either sustained, vigilant covert operations against Saddam's non-conventional weapons and delivery systems, or assassination of the Butcher of Baghdad himself. Recently, many U.S. officials have become convinced of this view as well. According to the Jerusalem Report, strong Republican pressure has forced the Clinton Administration to form contingency plans for eliminating Saddam if the opportunity arises.

The deal struck by Kofi Annan last week has not changed much. Many have already recognized the loopholes in Annan's package, with Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott calling it a strategy of "appeasement." Lott has it right on the money. At a minimum, the deal has bought Saddam precious time, and it may also enable him to restrict the U.N. inspectors' access to some sites in ways that the United States has previously said would be unacceptable. Meanwhile, new reports indicate that Saddam may be close to deploying unmanned drones with a range of up to 500 miles, and that he may have hidden some of his scud missiles in other countries before the U.N. inspectors could get to them.

To those who oppose American military intervention against Iraq under any circumstances I say: You have not learned the lessons of history; appeasing a tyrant will only embolden and strengthen him. Israelis are rightfully worried that they will be Saddam's primary target when he finally acts out the full scope of his genocidal intentions. During the Gulf War, he promised to "burn half of Israel," and that promise has not been forgotten. A nation is threatened with annihilation, and the United States has the power to curb that threat. How can anyone argue, in good conscience, for a policy of appeasement?

The response of so many Americans to ignore Saddam's terrible threat has left me saddened. It has strengthened my conviction that Israel must never rely on another country to defend its security. As an ardent Zionist, my goal is to make my home in Israel someday soon. In my dreams, I will live in a peaceful, cooperative Middle East. As late Prime Minister Rabin so often stressed, this dream will only become a reality if Israel pursues peace with those who seek peace and fights vigilantly those who seek to destroy it. Perhaps someday the people of the United States will learn the same lesson.

Of course, I would not attempt to claim that democracies have perfect records either, but the fact is that communist states survive based on state-sponsored oppression and tyranny.

If you support the plight of millions of Iraqi children, or if you simply want to learn more about the issue, come out and show your support. This is the least that we can do to show the university – and more importantly to show ourselves – that there are still many people out there who care.

The two Prince Charmings, Patrick Bell (left) and Lawrence Long, lament their unrequited love in "Into the Woods," which opens Friday.

MOMENTS IN THE WOODS

UCLA's Musical Theatre Workshop ventures into the woods to stage Stephen Sondheim's comedic collage of fairy tales

The wolf (Lawrence Long) devours Little Red Ridinghood (Amanda Blanchard).

By Cheryl Klein
Daily Bruin Senior Staff

"I think the audience is going to pick up on a sense of self reliance," muses first-year theater student Lawrence Long. "And also a sense of interdependence."

It's a little hard to take him seriously. Sure, his insights about this latest slice of drama are dead on, but, well, maybe it's that he's wearing a big hairy wolf mask on his head.

Standing against a backdrop of rainbow-hued trees and funky little cottages that look as if they were plucked right out of a Dr. Seuss book, Long is rehearsing for the Musical Theatre Workshop's production of "Into the Woods," which opens Friday in Schoenberg Hall.

Anyone who's read "Oh, the Places You'll Go" knows that silly and fantastical can also be philosophical and even life-changing. So perhaps Stephen Sondheim paged through a little Seuss before sitting down to compose a score about love, death, longing for new emotional territory and an irrational fear of dwarves, among other things.

"Into the Woods" intertwines the stories of Little Red Ridinghood, Cinderella, Rapunzel, and Jack and the Beanstalk. A childless baker and his wife try to enlarge their family tree by appeasing a crafty witch who demands a "cow as white as milk," a "cape as red as blood," "hair as yellow as corn" and a "slipper as pure as gold." It's easy to see how this little shopping list might bring them face to face with other fairy tale regulars.

But in these woods, no one is quite as innocent as the brothers Grimm would have us believe, and all the characters must confront their own inner turmoil if they hope to live happily ever after.

Long, who plays both a suave version of the wolf that attacks Little Red Ridinghood and Cinderella's Prince Charming explains the subtext – yes, subtext – of his fairy tale roles.

"You know the whole wolf in sheep's clothing idea? Well, the prince is in the clothing and they're almost like the same character," Long says. He gesturds to his canine ensemble, complete with furry cuffs and a bare belly painted silver. "This is the prince, but now he doesn't have to wear all those clothes and he can do what he wants to. He can have fun."

Cinderella also gets a little more depth in Sondheim and writer James Lapine's account.

"In the original fairy tale Cinderella is depicted as the innocent girl whose dreams come true for her automatically," says second-year communications student Jill Simonian, who plays the housekeeper-turned-heroine. "In this it's depicted that she wants to go to the festival, but when she finally gets there it's not what she expected and in the end it turns out that she was worse off after she got Prince Charming."

While the first act closes with a rousing all-cast chorus of "Ever After," suggesting that all is right

Asian Americans in media to be honored

AWARD: Organization aims to raise awareness, break down stereotypes

By Aimee Phan
Daily Bruin Staff

Finding an Asian American on a television show or in a movie is like winning the jackpot in Vegas. Very rare.

But Asian Americans have been making progress in the entertainment and media industry in recent years – and Sunday night, the Media Action Network for Asian Americans (MANAA) will be holding its fifth annual Media Achievement Awards Banquet to honor those who have made the most remarkable accomplishments this year.

MANAA, founded in 1992, is a media watchdog/education group that strives to promote a more sensitive and accurate representation of Asian Americans in the media.

This year, the awards go to "M. Butterfly" playwright David Henry Hwang, the producers of the sci-fi series "Star Trek: Voyager" and Academy-Award nominated documentary director Renee Tajima-Pena.

While these honorees have made great strides in elevating the Asian American presence in the media, most agree that Asian Americans still have a long way to go before they are represented fairly and accurately in film and television.

By giving feedback to the studios about the portrayal of Asian Americans, MANAA hopes to do away with old stereotypes and establish more positive and realistic images in their places.

Guy Aoki, former president and co-founder of MANAA, helped form the group in 1992 after watching how the unfair depictions of Asian Americans in the media were going undetected by the public. For him, the final straw was the negative media coverage of the 50th anniversary of the Pearl Harbor bombing and the anti-Asian sentiment that was being aroused from it.

"We thought enough was enough," Aoki says. "I just thought of all the hate crimes that were going to result from reviving this old hatred. We realized that there wasn't an organization that was monitoring and giving feedback to the media about how Asian Americans are portrayed."

One of the organization's self-appointed duties is making sure the media's portrayal of Asian Americans on film and television is fair and not racially derogatory. This includes protesting against films which play up to Asian racial stereotypes that could harm the mainstream public's image of Asian Americans. One of their biggest protests was against the controversial 1993 Sean Connery-Wesley Snipes movie, "Rising Sun," which promoted stereotypes of Asian men as ruthless businessmen and Asian females as sex objects.

"It was an educational campaign, not a boycott," Aoki says. "We were complaining about the depiction of the Japanese in the movie. We met with the producer and the president of Twentieth Century Fox (the studio that produced the film), but they were unwilling to soften the racially inflammatory depictions."

ALM Entertainment

"Power Rangers" star Patricia Lee will emcee the MANAA Awards.

While "Rising Sun" was more blatant with the Asian stereotypes, many films and television shows can be found guilty of relaxing into typical Asian stock characters in their story lines. Most films and TV shows today hardly feature any Asian American characters, and if they do, they are often depicted in stereotypical and subservient roles.

"They let Asian Americans play the stereotype role of a waiter, a kung fu artist or a drug lord from Hong Kong," Aoki says. "It's hard for them to see an Asian American playing someone (ordinary) like a marriage counselor."

Latest from Grisham too similar to 'The Firm'

BOOK: Ready-made for a movie, 'Street Lawyer' follows the standard formula

By Christopher Bates
Daily Bruin Contributor

John Grisham's new book, "The Street Lawyer," tells the story of a young lawyer who battles an evil corporation and, because of his incredible savvy as well as the righteousness of his cause, comes out a winner.

If this sounds familiar to Grisham fans, it should, because it essentially the plot of every John Grisham book.

This particular story revolves around Michael Brock, attorney-at-law in the firm of Drake & Sweeney. Brock is a rising star among the 800 lawyers of his firm and is sure to make partner soon. Then, tragedy strikes. Brock is held hostage by a homeless man. Though Brock escapes physically unharmed, he is a changed man. He becomes disenchanted with the corporate life and moves on to a new career as an advocate for the homeless.

BOOK REVIEW

The Street Lawyer
Author: John Grisham
Publisher: Doubleday
Price: $27.95

Grade:

JOE BARRY/Daily Bruin

The remainder of the plot will remain unsaid, such as it is. However, if this sounds somewhat trite and cliché, that's because it is. The rest of the book, unfortunately, does not do much better.

Most of the standard elements of a Grisham work are here. The legal profession takes its usual thrashing – lawyers are greedy and materialistic, judges are manipulative and lack compassion, politicians are interested only in getting votes, and everyone else is too blind or ignorant to see what's going on.

Brock is also the standard fare; he's young, he worked extra hard to make his way through an exclusive law school, and now he has a career trajectory that will eventually make him wealthy beyond most people's wildest dreams. Tom Cruise might as well play him in the movie version. (It's essentially the same character as we saw in "The Firm.")

The main difference between "The Street Lawyer" and Grisham's past work is the fact that Brock's epiphany comes early in the novel. Most of the time, the lawyer doesn't see the error of his ways until halfway through the book, which leaves just enough time for a prolonged battle and a "stunning" climax.

This could have been interesting. From his other works, we have very little sense that Grisham believes a lawyer can see the light and still stay in the profession. Certainly Grisham himself bailed out and became an author. However, Brock's transition from corporate lawyer to street lawyer is not particularly believable or compelling. The character is not important to Grisham except as a means to his end, which is to deliver his message about the homeless.

Occasionally throughout his career Grisham has attempted to write a book that makes a statement. In fact, his first book, "A Time To Kill," was a thinly veiled takeoff on Harper Lee's classic "To Kill a Mockingbird." Unfortunately, there are two things that will probably always keep Grisham from writing a book of enduring importance.

First is Grisham's need to have a happy ending. In every book, the sympathetic character comes out on top. "The Street Lawyer's" ending is so happy that one wonders if the rights to the book have already been sold to Disney's animation division.

The greater constraint operating on Grisham, however, is his bottom line. Every book he writes has to be a best seller and has to be good material for a movie. Contrived drama, lawyer-bashing, happy endings and the like sell books and movie tickets. They will never make for a memorable piece of literature.

Unfortunately, because the message gets in the way of the story line, "The Street Lawyer" isn't even all that great as a piece of pulp fiction. "The Firm" had no pretensions about what it was and it was a more entertaining book for it. Too bad the same can't be said for "The Street Lawyer."

MUSIC: By reuniting and adding members, band has newfound success

By Michelle Zubiate
Daily Bruin Contributor

Lounging on the familiar steps of Kerckhoff, enjoying Southern California weather at its finest, UCLA alumni offer some words of wisdom on how to survive college life and really succeed.

"If you really want to just hang out and party, then major in political science," Scott Sellwood says.

"No, economics," Chris Golier says. "I am sure someone got something out of that major ... but you can not go to any classes, study one week before the final and you'd (still) be set."

Meet the rock band Burke. Three Bruin alumni and a bassist, they've got big dreams, much determination and true Bruin spirit. Since they graduated in 1993, Burke has not always traveled the easy road but it is one that is finally paying off.

Burke has recently seen the release of a new album, "Several Places at Once" (Trip 'n Spin Recordings), and people are just now discovering the sound Burke likes to describe as "indie-jam."

"'Indie' stands for independent label," guitarist Scott Pribble explains. "'Jam' would be the kind of rock we play ... jam music like Phish or Dave Matthews Band."

They started off as two members, Pribble and lead singer Scott Sellwood, playing in a cover band around UCLA and at parties. The band at first made a six-song demo tape, but soon broke up and didn't reunite until after graduation, when they added drummer and fellow alumnus Chris Golier in Northern California.

Since then, they've been writing their own music and playing around Berkeley at clubs and private parties. In December, bassist Rich Hayley joined the set, and this past weekend they brought it down south for Los Angeles' own Dragonfly club.

You won't find your typical rock musicians here, however. One might even call it an oxymoron: educated rock artists. You mean there is such a thing?

"Yeah. We're looking for a bigger label that wants to take a chance on smart UCLA people," Golier says. "We played last night at the Berkeley Haas School of Business. Talking to all those people is something. They kind of look down on you (because you're musicians), but maybe that's just business schools in general ... We don't need the band to survive (and) make a decent living."

Pribble originally came to UCLA from San Francisco but made the decision to move back up after graduating with a degree in political science and a specialization in business. Both he and Golier work for Internet companies in the Silicon Valley. To him, the whole experience has been a real learning process, from the live performances to their recent recording endeavor.

"We looked into a couple of recording studios and picked the one we felt most comfortable with," Pribble says.

"We basically went in saying we were going to be done in a month, and six months later it was finished. There were some problems. We definitely weren't used to taping."

"When you hear yourself on tape, you realize that when you think it is perfect you are really screwing up and destroying people's ears," Golier agrees.

"When you play live you can make a lot of mistakes and no one's going to

British dance company puts modern spin on classic techniques

SHOW: Troupe celebrates artistry, takes an unlikely mix of ballet and Rolling Stones music to new levels

By Jessie Blank
Daily Bruin Contributor

Classical dancers gracefully swirl and leap, plié and pirouette – all to the music of the Rolling Stones?

Paying homage to time honored tradition while simultaneously pushing the limits of modernity, the Rambert Dance Company will perform at the Veterans Wadsworth Theater Friday and Saturday at 8 p.m.

"It's exciting. It's sophisticated. It's inventive. It's eclectic ... Rambert is one of the most energetic and entertaining dance companies out of Great Britain today," says Michael Blachly, director of UCLA Center of the Performing Arts.

Rambert Dance Company, Britain's oldest dance company, returns to California with a revitalized style that has gained nothing but attention and accolades since 1994, when Christopher Bruce took over as Rambert's artistic director.

"Rooster," a piece that will play this weekend, exemplifies Bruce's ability to juxtapose timely and transcendent elements. Dancers trained in classical ballet execute contemporary dance movements to selections from the Rolling Stones. By using the Stones' music, whose success has surpassed the test of time, Bruce's choreography bridges the generation gap in a vivid image familiar to all ages.

A likeness of male machismo, in all its fine feathered glory, struts around the stage while dancers depict mating rituals and the masculine posturing of men.

"('Rooster') is a humorous and ironic look at the chauvinism of the lyrics of the Rolling Stones' songs ... It is an affectionate and hopefully enjoyable look at the times. The great thing about it is its range of audience ... from teenagers to people in their '70s," Bruce says.

Rambert will perform at the Veterans Wadsworth Theater.

This cross-generational appeal was never more obvious than when the director recently witnessed two old women bopping in their seats to the Stones' tunes.

Other timeless themes, like the somber truths found in nature and human struggle, are intertwined in Bruce's works.

"Swansong" depicts a lone, seated prisoner tortured by two interrogators who flail about him. Its poignant imagery, inspired by the work of the human rights organization Amnesty International, elicits very personal and unique reactions from the audience. The theme of "prisoner consciousness" unfolds as the interrogators bludgeon and ultimately kill the prisoner.

"('Swansong') is emotionally and physically draining, personally," says dancer Conor O'Brien of his portrayal of the battered victim.

One other piece appears on the bill for Rambert's Los Angeles visit. "Stream" combines abstract movements with fragmented music. Its nebulous message invites audience members to interpret the meaning for themselves. Resembling the cycle of life, "Stream," is divided into five sections; it portrays women and men and their interaction with nature.

The dancers' movements, much like those of mythical satyrs and nymphs, fuse the human element with the animalistic. Fully open to the dancers' own expression and the audience's interpretation, Bruce's conceit centers on the enigmatic roles of man and nature.

"I've abstracted ("Stream") as much as I can, so it is purely in dance form and one is allowed very free interpretations ... It has a strange structure. I haven't gone for a normal big bang finish. All the climaxes round off at the end, and then there is a feeling of the cycle beginning again," Bruce says.

Spain brings National Ballet to L.A. for anniversary show

DANCE: New artistic director offers company creativity, enthusiasm

By Aimee Phan
Daily Bruin Staff

A career in ballet starts early. Most dancers begin training at four or five years old and then go professional in their early teens.

But for 31-year-old Spanish dancer Aida Gomez, her early rise in the ballet world climaxed when she was named artistic director of the National Ballet of Spain two months ago, making her one of the youngest artistic directors of a ballet company in the world.

Beginning tonight, Gomez and the rest of her company will be performing their 20th Anniversary show at L.A.'s Universal Amphitheatre for four nights as a part of their 1998 six-city U.S. tour. The program will include both old and new ballet works that show the variety of the company's repertoire, something Gomez was very enthusiastic to bring together. Gomez has had a long history with the National Ballet of Spain, from joining the elite company at 14 and continuing as a soloist and prima ballerina. She recalls her lifelong relationship with dance, which began at a very early age, and admits to how instinctive it was for her to perform on the stage doing what she loved best.

"I was your basic little girl who loved music and dance and dreamed of being a ballerina," Gomez says in her native Spanish tongue, translated by her interpreter. "As a child, I never assumed that I would do anything else. At 13 I began to perform in front of audiences and I felt completely natural. It was second nature to me."

Gomez's natural talent for Spanish and classical dance led to a successful run with the National Ballet of Spain. She was promoted to prima ballerina in 1985 and performed almost every major role in the company repertoire.

> "We nurture our artists from a very young age."
> Aida Gomez
> Artistic director > of the National Ballet of Spain

Gomez left the company briefly in 1997 to dance with the Joaquin Cortes Company but soon returned to the National Ballet to be appointed artistic director. Now Gomez is taking on new challenges and responsibilities that have opened her eyes to the more administrative side of professional dance.

"Obviously, I'm on the other side of things now," Gomez says. "I have much more responsibility, but I enjoy it immensely because I'm still very creatively involved. I bear on one hand the weight of mounting the show and how it's going to look and I'm also involved in the creative process on the inside. As a result, I have to work very closely with the performers and dancers."

Gomez certainly has her work cut out for her since the National Ballet has long been considered one of the leading ballet companies in Spain. She explains that what makes the National Ballet such a successful dance troupe is the training and care the company gives to the young dancers.

"We nurture our artists from a very young age," Gomez says. "We're known for taking young people and then maintaining them within the company for however long it takes for that person to become ready to be a soloist or just join the company for performing."

One of the most difficult tasks for Gomez to accomplish as artistic director is continuing the National Ballet's prestigious reputation while bringing the dance company into the future with newer works and styles.

"It's very challenging," Gomez says. "From the new pressure that I'm facing in maintaining the traditional repertoire to putting a new element that I want to do, the main objective is to always maintain the high quality that the company is renowned for."

Gomez's hard work will be put to the test with this weekend's performances. The young artistic director has a certain affection for this show because it combines both classical numbers and brand new works in celebration of the company's 20th anniversary.

"The show is particularly special because we're featuring a lineup of all the past directors that we've had and members of the company who have become successful in their own right," Gomez says. "The fact that they'll all be on one stage in one evening is spectacular."

The two new works, "Zapateado" and "La Vida Breve," reveal the variety and eclectic nature of the company and Gomez herself. She explains in detail the differences and unique features of both programs.

> "It was a once in a lifetime opportunity that came along and I couldn't refuse it."
> Aida Gomez

"Where 'Zapateado' is a piece that features one soloist onstage and doing very technical work, 'La Vida Breve' features the entire company on stage and it's a very classical and traditional piece," Gomez says. "It also features a lot of Spanish folklore with long costumes. So you've got the contrasting of one stark intense performance and then this wonderful gala of a stage boiling over with beautiful visuals."

While she has enjoyed her responsibilities as the artistic director very much and hopes to continue leading the company to explore new dance choreography and styles, Gomez hasn't forgotten her true calling as a performer.

"It was a once in a lifetime opportunity that came along and I couldn't refuse it," Gomez says. "But I am still contracted to dance and I'm looking forward to integrating back into the performance once I get the company underway and set the new repertoire for the coming year. I'm enjoying it very much."

As for aspiring dancers out there who one day hope to attain the success Gomez has achieved, she strongly believes that having a career in dance is determined by the ballerina's own spirit.

"It's a very interesting cocktail," Gomez says about what it takes to make it in dance. "You have to be intelligent, have strength and passion, and above all else, you have to love love love what you're doing."

DANCE: The National Ballet of Spain will perform at the Universal Amphitheatre March 5 through 8. Tickets are $33 to $58. Call (213) 252-TIXS or (714) 740-2000.

Risky, risque animation seeks to expose normally taboo topics

FILM: Works offer array of styles ranging from ridiculous to disturbing

By Teron Hide
Daily Bruin Contributor

When the public thinks of animation, images of blue genies, Greek gods, a hunchback and a frightening beast usually come to mind. Manga Entertainment enters the arena with an alternative. Mind-boggling, eye-popping and jaw-dropping characterize reactions to "General Chaos: Uncensored Animation."

Beginning Friday, the Nuart Theater will screen this collection of the most eccentric and wild animated shorts to ever hit the big screen. As a result, the compilation offers 90 minutes of entertainment that is a far cry from anything that other major studios would distribute.

The 20 individual titles date from the mid-'80s until now, and were created by a variety of animators from several different countries. Naturally, each clip has its own unique visual style. The wide-mix of techniques range from computer-generated art to puppetry and clay animation. The subjects consistently revolve around two themes: sex and violence. There are also multiple mutilation and death scenes.

While most of the short pieces are meant to be comedic in form, "General Chaos" offers violence in its most graphic, sex at its most vivid explicit and profanity in is most raw form. The final result is a product advised not to be viewed by individuals under the age of 17 (or with a weak stomach).

"The entire film (compilation) will offer more animated sexual organs per foot than anything else," says Walter Santucci, the animator of "Attack of the Hungry, Hungry Nipples."

"Being uncensored allows the animators to show hundreds of things that fear wipes out of any other studio creation."

> "If they see no humor in the situation, then that is their choice."
> Tony Nittoli
> Animator

Since most of the short films run under five minutes, there is not a lot of time to present solid story lines and themes. But the incentive to animators was being able to exercise complete control over their work.

"The only thing that a big company can offer is to pay my bills a little bit better," Santucci says. "I might as well be delivering pizzas to households because the big mainstream companies would never allow me to have absolute creative control."

On the simpler side, there is Jeff Sturgis' "American Flatulators," which spoofs farting contests, and Keith Alcorn's ode to masturbation in "Beat the Meatles."

Although some of the pieces lack concrete plots, "General Chaos: Uncensored Animation," makes up for it through a few notable works that are actually quite spiritual and thought-provoking.

A more cerebral entry is Tyron Montgomery's "Quest," which won the 1996 Oscar for best animated short subject. And there is Mike Booth's look at the surreal workings of heaven in "The Saint Inspector," and David Donar's fatal outlook for the dwellers of a trendy coffee house in "Espresso Depresso."

Probably the most dark and disturbing short, though, is Tony Nittoli's "Junky." This story is centered around the sexual abuse of a foul-mouthed parrot, by his master, in attaining his fix for crackers.

Interestingly, Nittoli does not feel that the public should be stunned at the sight of a sexually-abused parrot being addicted to crackers, in the same way that a junky craves drugs.

"I was not going for any real shock value," Nittoli says, an actor formerly seen on the "Wonder Years" and "NYPD Blue."

"I want people to enjoy and laugh at my work, but I really made it for me. If they see no humor in the situation, then that is their choice."

Unlike Nittoli, who started out with a Super 8 camera and began showing his pictures at underground festivals, Santucci did not initially want to become an animator. He was not interested in drawing and did not even enjoy reading comic books. Santucci felt that comics were just too confusing and left him feeling unsatisfied. His interests and passions were guided by music, especially modern hip-hop. This is exemplified in a couple of Santucci's previous works, where such renown rappers as Ice-T and Ice Cube can be found as the voices for some of his characters.

"Presenting the little of the world that I can affect with different cultures and backgrounds is one of my personal goals," Santucci says. "That's where art and entertainment can actually make a difference in the world by depicting positive images without preaching."

The short films in "General Chaos: Uncensored Animation" deal with human subjects that are often considered taboo or unacceptable by the general public. It is here, though, that the individual is truly expressed.

FILM: "General Chaos: Uncensored Animation" opens at the Nuart Theater on Friday and runs through March 12.

Nothing at all may come out of Seinfeld

TELEVISION: Fans proffer ideas for popular NBC sitcom's sequel options

By Valerie Kuklenski
Los Angeles Daily News

If the original really has been a show about nothing, as its creators and stars say, then what would be the best title for a "Seinfeld" spinoff: "Nothing Much," "Nothing More" or "Nothing From Nothing Leaves Nothing," maybe?

We'll leave that to the programming brainstormers over at NBC. Meanwhile, it's time to disclose what some fans suggest for a sequel to the top-rated comedy series, which bows out in May after nine seasons.

Of course, this probably is an exercise in futility, given that Julia Louis-Dreyfus (as Elaine Benes), Michael Richards (Cosmo Kramer) and Jason Alexander (George Costanza) have said they would like to follow Jerry Seinfeld's lead and let the series become a pleasant memory ... and a source of many residual checks for years to come.

However, NBC and Castle Rock Entertainment, the show's production company, surely are sorry to lose this advertising gold mine, and they might be trying to come up with ways to keep the franchise going, with or without its most familiar players.

So here, with no strings attached, not even an expensive lunch tab, are some suggested outlines for "Nothing at all," or whatever they want to call it:

If quantity counts, Eric Krakow of North Hollywood would take the prize with 12 story ideas, many of which called for continuing the George/Kramer/Elaine triumvirate with various substitutions for a newly-wed and newly-moved Jerry: O.J. Simpson as himself, Johnny Carson as a retired salesman, Tim Conway as a divorced IRS agent.

Among Krakow's other suggestions: "Shoshanna," with Jerry's real-life ex-girlfriend taking over his apartment after they break up and he moves to Las Vegas, and "The Ghost, Elaine, Kramer and George," in which Jerry has died and only his three close friends can see or hear him – the audience can't. (Picture another TV version of "Topper" without the translucent Cary Grant.)

Valerie Hendrix would fill Seinfeld's shoes with "Roseanne" alum John Goodman, while Linda Jill Tapia of Encino would dispatch Jerry to the Florida condo circuit (that's what he gets for quitting) and would bring in Mike Myers of "Wayne's World" and "Saturday Night Live" as the new leading man.

Susan Leighton of Glendale gives Jerry his exit in the form of a new sitcom deal in California. Kramer and Newman (Wayne Knight) have been hired by Elaine's catalog company, J. Peterman Co., to promote it in Europe and Elaine, in a drunken stupor, has eloped with boyfriend David Puddy (Patrick Warburton). That leaves George to fend for himself in a larger apartment in Jerry's old New York building, with his parents (Jerry Stiller and Estelle Harris) as new neighbors. Meanwhile, Kramer's half-brother has moved into his old apartment and George's former digs are occupied by an Elaine look-alike. (Still with us?)

George, aspiring to break into Jerry's line of work, becomes a busboy at a comedy club and is rescued one night from a nasty confrontation with a customer by the comic on stage. Leighton says George and the for a year and a half, cites Bruce's unconventional and unfettered style as the feature that sets Rambert apart from other companies.

"There is so much more freedom within this company. It makes me freer and I can let go," O'Brien says.

Contemporary dance rooted in classical technique is Rambert's signature. This combination serves the company's dual purpose of innovation and tradition that founder Marie Rambert established in 1926.

> "Our ultimate vision is to be a truly versatile contemporary dance repertory company."

> Artistic director

Bruce, who studied under Rambert at 13, perpetuates his teacher's goal; he melds the old and the new, the classical and the contemporary and the traditional and the abstract in his artistic direction.

"Our ultimate vision is to be a truly versatile contemporary dance repertory company – that is very unusual. We accept a lot of people's work that adds many different shades to our performance," Bruce says.

In the past year, Rambert has collected three Outstanding Achievement Awards.

Although stable in its stance atop the contemporary dance world, Rambert has weathered some treacherous storms that in past years have plagued London's dance community.

Several other companies capsized during Rambert's struggle to stay afloat.

"Rambert has come out with some extremely fresh work and good choreography," Blachly says.

"It has been some time since they have been on our stage and it's time to return."

DANCE: Rambert Dance Company performs at the Veterans Wadsworth Theater on Friday and Saturday at 8 p.m., preceded by a Center Stage Lecture at 7 p.m. with artistic director Christopher Bruce. Tickets are $35, $32 and $10 with UCLA ID. For more information, call (310) 825-2101.

ACHIEVEMENT

An example of a positive Asian American on television that Aoki and the rest of MANAA hope to have more of is former UCLA student Garrett Wang's character Ensign Harry Kim on "Star Trek: Voyager." Wang's multi-layered portrayal of the naive and romantic Kim is one of the very few examples of a three-dimensional Asian American character on a continuing television series.

"Garrett Wang has been a very positive character on the show," Aoki says. "He's a romantic interest, not asexual and without a penis like other Asian men on TV have been. He's not a stereotype on the show and he's had the chance to show his stuff."

Wang, who also stars in the upcoming indie film "Hundred Percent" (which features an all Asian American lead cast), understands from first-hand experiences how difficult it is for Asian American actors to break through the stereotypes Hollywood harbors against them. He says he also believes that Asian American men have an even more difficult time than women because of longstanding anti-Asian sentiment that has existed in America.

"Asian American males are seen as two-dimensional and as the enemy," Wang says. "Asian American women are a different case because they are seen as more desirable and exotic by Caucasians who have an Asian fetish. That's why you have a Connie Chung and not a Joe Chung."

But both Wang and Aoki agree that the biggest problem for them in the media right now is their barely-there existence. Wang points out that a recent survey taken by the Screen Actors' Guild revealed that while Asian Americans make up 4 percent of the population, less than 1 percent of the roles on film and television are portrayed by Asian Americans. Aoki says this is because of Hollywood's fear of trying something unfamiliar and unproven.

"They're not very courageous people," Aoki says of Hollywood executives and producers. "They're too afraid to try something new. Someone's got to take a chance to open their eyes."

And Aoki says he still believes that the studios' presumptions about old-fashioned racism is probably the most common reason they hesitate to hire Asian American actors for more mainstream roles.

"The industry has tended to underestimate the intelligence of their audience," Aoki says. "They don't think that a white person in Mississippi can handle an Asian person as a heroic character on screen. It's very narrow-minded thinking."

One of the ways Wang believes this problem can be improved is by having more Asian Americans in the entertainment industry.

"People in Hollywood are more prone to jumping on the bandwagon since they're not as independently creative as they could be," Wang says. "You need like a Spike Kim to break down some walls like Spike Lee did for the African Americans."

Since Asian Americans are barely existent on any long-running comedy series, Wang says the only way this can be solved is by having a successful sitcom on the air comprised mainly of Asian American characters.

While this was attempted several years back with the ABC sitcom "All-American Girl" starring standup comedian Margaret Cho, the show was canceled after only one season. Wang blames this failure on the limited appeal of ethnic humor, which the show heavily relied on for laughs.

"All the jokes were about the generation and cultural gaps between the grandmother and (Cho)," Wang says. "It didn't focus on her strength as a comedian. It just did all ethnic jokes. They may be funny for a while, but they don't last. You have to make the comedy universal."

As for integrating more Asian Americans onto the big screen, Wang says one strategy is to cast them in roles alongside white and African American actors so audiences can grow more accustomed to seeing them on the screen.

"We need to get plugged into the formula of a Hollywood blockbuster," Wang says. "If audiences go to see a mainstream movie for the white actors, then they can leave being surprised and impressed with the young charismatic Asian American star in it."

See ACHIEVEMENT, page 37

While Aoki and Wang agree that there has been slow improvement thanks to groups like the MANAA, they both believe that unless more Asian Americans get into the business as writers and studio executives, progress will linger on at a snail's pace, a fate neither wants to see.

Aoki points out how essential it is for more Asian Americans to be on the screen not only for equality reasons, but also for the future generations of Asian Americans who will look to movies and television shows for an identity.

"If you don't see Asian Americans on TV when you're growing up, you feel like you don't belong," Aoki says. "A lot of young Asian American children grow up feeling like they don't belong."

Wang adds, "It shouldn't be like this, it's ridiculous. The Asian Americans have a wealth of history and culture to go on. Somebody has to take the first step."

AWARDS: The Media Achievement Awards Banquet will be held Sunday evening at the Empress Pavilion Restaurant in Chinatown. For more information about admission to the event, please call (213) 486-4433.

WOODS

in fairyland, the second act picks up where the original storytellers left off. For example, what happens when Cinderella's prince falls for a new princess in a new tower (who's oddly asleep and surrounded by a thicket of briar)? What happens "if you know what you want, then you go and you find it and you get it," as the baker's wife says, but then it's not what you wanted after all?

"What is happy ever after?" says third-year political science student Tom McMahon, who plays the baker. "The show takes a very familiar tale and puts a spin on it and applies it to real life."

He and fourth-year Italian and film student Tali Magal, who plays his wife, dissect their on-stage relationship in very real life terms.

"They think that having a child will make their marriage perfect and then once they get that child, they realize it's not just having a baby," McMahon says. "There are real problems between the two of them. And for the baker, it's stuff that goes way back to not having a father."

"It's like a Woody Allen movie," Magal laughs. "It's so multi-leveled. You see it the first time and it's funny, it's a cute musical. And then you read the script again and there are these unbelievable things with the lyrics ... This is like new age esoteric philosophy."

Anyone considering catching the show twice also has the chance to see two different interpretations of the work, given that the show is double-cast. This gives more students a chance to gain workshop experience, which is one of campus' most competitive organizations thanks to its professional environment and an alum list that includes Broadway's Jodie Benson and Sam Harris.

And with UCLA's top performers to pick from, director John Hall found it surprisingly easy to cast the musically complex, nearly three hour long show.

"I just lucked out this year," Hall says. "This is definitely the year to do 'Into the Woods' because I've got the whole range covered."

"It's long, it's complicated, the music is very sophisticated," Hall continues. The lyrics are such a mouthful that the parody "Forbidden Broadway" dubbed the show "Into the Words." "It takes a lot of concentration because of the length. So it tends to lag. We need raisins or oranges or something to raise the blood sugar back up," Hall laughs.

They also face the constraints of limited backstage capacities, but with a little improvisation and maybe a little magic (hey, what are fairy tales for?), they've turned a dog house into a cozy cottage stove and added puffs of smoke and sparks of fire to compliment the performers' blood curdling screams and other moments of melodrama.

The cast, still a little giddy at the sets and uncomfortable in their petticoats and knickers, credits Hall and musical director Gary Busby with taking them as far as they have with the show.

"I think people outside the class tend to be intimidated by (Hall)," Long says. Indeed, Hall has a habit of barking out stage directions as the students move through their scenes and telling them flat out what doesn't work. "He's kind of intimidating to us, too, but he's absolutely wonderful. Don't tell him I said that."

So as opening night draws near, the cast can take comfort in a little advice from Sondheim himself: "Everything you learn there/ will help when you return there."

THEATER: "Into the Woods" opens Friday at Schoenberg's Jan Popper Theatre and runs through March 14. Pre-show Sondheim review begins at 7 p.m. Tickets are $10, $7 with UCLA ID. For more information, call (310) 825-4761. For tickets, call 825-2101.

comedian become friends, and the new premise is born.

Several readers favor a show centered on Michael Richards.

Phyllis Richards (no relation) submitted prospective titles only: "Kramer," "Kramer and Co.," "Cosmo and Pals," "Cosmo Kramer, President," and "The Cosmo Files." And these come from John Zanderzuk of Lancaster: "Cosmo Kramer: Private Eye" or "Cosmo Kramer: Cab Driver."

"Isn't it obvious? Kramer and Newman!" writes Barry Lowenkron of Encino (in a sentiment echoed by Lawrence Wilner of North Hollywood). "Whenever these two played off against each other, the results have been hilarious."

Lowenkron says it would not be a true "Seinfeld" sequel, but a whole new series based on established characters, much like the "Frasier" formula bears little resemblance to "Cheers." He predicts that Richards and Knight "could be the greatest madcap team to ever hit TV." With all due respect to Lucille Ball and Vivian Vance, of course.

"At the top 25 U.S. law schools, 3 out of 4 students who prepped for the LSAT chose Kaplan."

1997 Bruskin-Goldring Research Study

Here's why:

	Kaplan	Everyone else
Expert Teachers	Kaplan teachers have the best credentials and teaching skills. In fact, the median LSAT score of our teachers is higher than that of Harvard Law School students! And every Kaplan teacher must complete a rigorous national training program. Kaplan teachers average 40+ hours of training before they ever teach a class!	Your instructor may not even have taken the LSAT. And even if they did, have they been trained to teach you to ace the test?
Exclusive Materials	Only Kaplan has the answers and explanations to every released exam—over 2,100 questions from 21+ exams. Kaplan also gives you in-depth explanations, exclusive insight, and effective strategies for every question.	Anyone can buy old LSATs from Law Services. So, don't be impressed by a company that promises to give you a "big book" of LSATs. After all, what good are the questions if you don't get explanations and strategies?
Superior Methods	Kaplan gets you more points in less time. The Kaplan system, including a Personal Study Plan, is the most effective and efficient way to learn. We make sure you use every minute of your preparation to your best advantage. We've got hundreds of practice hours if you need them, but we don't think you will.	Our competitors can't match our proven results. They want you to focus instead on the number of classes or number of hours they offer. But don't be deceived by unnecessary practice and wasteful review. Expert test prep means targeted training.
Proven Results	+7.2 Points—According to a study by Price Waterhouse, Kaplan LSAT students improve an average of 7.2 points. And 9 out of 10 Kaplan LSAT students go to one of their top three school choices.*	One unscrupulous company has been regularly adjusting its score increase claims for years. Only Kaplan has independent proof from a Big Six accounting firm that our course works.

BURKE

catch it," Pribble says. "When you record on tape you have to make sure it's perfect more or less. We had a lot to learn."

Golier admits that UCLA has helped the music career through the friends they made. As he looks around the campus, he notices the changes the quad has undergone since he's last seen it. He also sees a familiar face.

"That's (former basketball player) Derrick Martin over there. On the right," Golier says. "He used to play while we were here. Now he plays for the Clippers ... We still follow the sports. Except now they are a lot more successful now than they were back then. We were good except now the school's actually putting emphasis on the important stuff like paying the players, recruiting."

"I still have tons of friends from UCLA," Golier continues. "Scott (Pibble) and I live together up in San Francisco and there are a huge group of us that go out. It makes it easier to get people to come to our shows in San Francisco."

And how does the band feel about its new hometown, compared to their alma mater? "Berkeley sucks compared to UCLA!" Sellwood proclaims.

"We're more a ... coffee bar kind of band."

Rich Hayley
Burke bassist

Lead singer Sellwood reigns as the band's most intellectual individual. Along with the release of the new CD, Sellwood can add another degree to his list of accomplishments. This year he will graduate from Berkeley law school with a joint masters degree in environmental science. He has already been offered a job with an environmental law firm in San Francisco but he plans to hold out on the offer until he sees where the band is leading.

He and Pribble both write music for the group but most of the lyrics come from Sellwood's own experiences in both life and nature. Describing the actual sound their band has is a little difficult.

"I would say we were a cross between mainstream alternative and an indie-sound. We're a little low budget," Sellwood says.

"I would say we're more of a college coffee bar kind of band," Hayley says. "If you went to a college bar this is the type of music you would hear. We pattern more towards that kind of crowd than to a nose-ring and tattoo crowd. There's two sides to modern rock. There's the grunge side and then we're more quirky college kids."

Hayley joined the band recently but the others agree that he has helped to strengthen their performance and sound. Burke is the first sort of modern rock band he has worked with, coming from punk and metal scenes, or "hair galore" as he put it.

"It's been overwhelming to say the least," Hayley says. "I've been with the band for about four weeks and already have done three gigs and come to L.A. to play. (Burke is) really a working band."

The band is held together by a kind of working chemistry that develops between real friends. They've found support in both friends and family.

"My dad would tell people at his office about us," Golier says. "Bores them to death. They can't wait to get out of there and when they ask what kind of music we play, he tried to regurgitate what I say. 'Well, they're kinda like Smushing Pumpkins.' He's funny."

How to Write an Effective Ad
- Start your ad with the merchandise you are selling. This makes it easier for readers to quickly scan the ads and locate your items.
- Always include the price of your item. Many classified readers simply do not respond to ads without prices.
- Avoid abbreviations—make your ad easy for readers to understand.
- Place yourself in the reader's position, ask what you would like to know about the merchandise, and include that in the ad. Include such information as brand names, colors and other specific descriptions.

The ASUCLA Communications board fully supports the University of California's policy on nondiscrimination. No medium shall accept advertisements which present persons of any origin, race, sex, or sexual orientation in a demeaning way or imply that they are limited to positions, capabilities, roles, or status in society. Neither the Daily Bruin nor the ASUCLA Communications Board has investigated any of the services advertised or the advertisements represented in this issue. Any person believing that an advertisement in this issue violated the Board's policy on nondiscrimination stated herein should communicate complaints in writing to the Business Manager, Daily Bruin, 118 Kerckhoff Hall, 308 Westwood Plaza, Los Angeles, CA 90024. For assistance with housing discrimination problems, call the UCLA Housing Office at (310) 825-4271 or call the Westside Fair Housing Office at (310) 475-9671. Life of the Party!

Party on Ralph!
Actually the party now IS on Ralph!
Thanks for the memories Ralph!
MOST UCLA students drink no more than 4 when they party. So what?
So, students who drink 4 or less have better love lives, are happier with their relationships, and don't become the "Life of the Party".

DONE 4

Now this is fun! Ralph here was demonstrating his uncanny ability to make a total ass of himself. Sure he was fun for awhile. The "Life of the Party", but then Ralph started pounding down the brewskis like a bone dry sea sponge. It was down the hatch and damn the torpedoes! Ralph had a one way ticket to partyland, and by jove he was going to live a little. He babbled on and on about some guy named Dick, who had a good head and loved to socialize. This Dick had heard that the party line was long, but if he could adhere to the dress code he could flutter about disguised as a social butterfly. He'd fight class struggle world wide and hold the partying back until spring break, (when he would party hardy, without winding down bottoms up in the student union!) When Ralph finally did shut up (actually he finally passed out, thank God) he once again became the life of the party. He helped a Literature major polish up on her prose with a pretty permanent pen. When Ralph didn't quite make it to the little boy's room, a photojournalism student was there to bravely capture his little accident; and a pre-med princess got a chance to try out her new "won't rub off" lipstick on Ralph! What a chump. Hey Ralph! Most UCLA students drink four or less when they party. Some don't drink at all. Ralph drinks too much. He should drink less. He should talk less too. He should bathe more too! Not to mention his breath. It's your life, so party or Ralph! Just remember: When you've done 4 you're done.

Congratulations to Our 15 Senior Spotlights!

Bruinlife Yearbook would like to congratulate the 15 winners of the Senior Spotlight Award.

We would also like to thank all who expressed interest and took the time to apply.

Good luck and continued success in your future endeavors.

The Senior Spotlight Award was developed to recognize distinguished UCLA seniors. These talented students are chosen from a large number of senior applicants, each of which has excelled in many areas during their career at UCLA. Each year these "spotlighted" graduates receive a special page in their honor in the senior section of the Bruinlife Yearbook. This special recognition of outstanding seniors is unique to Bruinlife and is only one of the many interesting ways UCLA and its students are captured in the yearbook.

Today, Bruinlife would like to recognize Vincent Villanueva for his outstanding achievements. Read about him, along with these fourteen other Senior Spotlights, only in this year's Bruinlife Yearbook:

KARIAKIN

and the Warriors terminated his contract, saying that he violated Section 16 of the uniform player contract, which states that players must "conform to standards of good citizenship and good moral character."

Now, I don't think my old Cub Scout manual mentioned it specifically, but I'm pretty sure that choking somebody violates the ideas of good citizenship and moral character.

Of course, Sprewell and friends don't see it that way.

"This decision is a victory that is shared by Latrell and the other 400 members of our union. It reaffirms the sanctity of guaranteed contracts in the NBA," union President Billy Hunter told the Associated Press.

Amen, brother; protect the sanctity of those contracts, but do explain to me where it rates in importance with the sanctity of human life.

You folks remember Billy, don't you? He's the dope guy from a couple columns back. It's his job to fight for his players regardless of how guilty they are.

Feerick based the decision on the technicalities of previous punishments doled out by the league.

"The evidence indicates that there is no history of both the league and a team imposing discipline for the same violent conduct, on or off the court," Feerick wrote in his decision. "This speaks to the issue of fairness, as I see it."

Fairness? How is this fair?

I don't care what sort of contract or lawyers he had, if Spree's job was washing cars, he couldn't have gotten his $5.25 an hour back after choking his boss.

And you can be sure that whatever job you have, they wouldn't keep on paying you after you wrapped your hands around somebody's throat.

Face it, Spree is getting his second chance for one reason and one reason only: he's famous.

It happens all the time, a pro athlete or movie star receiving special treatment from our supposedly impartial legal system. It is so common that Spree's wasn't even the only example in the sporting world over the last 48 hours.

There was also the case of Red Sox All-Star first baseman Mo Vaughn, charged with drunk driving after crashing and flipping his truck early on the morning of Jan. 9 while on his way home from a strip club.

When police arrived, he refused to take a breathalyzer test, but subsequently failed eight other sobriety tests.

> It happens all the time, a pro athlete ... receiving special treatment from our supposedly impartial legal system.

According to the Associated Press, police testified that on his third try Vaughn recited the alphabet "A-B-D-C-H-L-M."

His attorney claimed the failures could have been the result of Vaughn's being sleepy, dazed from the accident, or, get this, because he had put on weight in the offseason.

Try that one the next time you come up short on a midterm: "You see, Professor, I missed all the multiple choice because I have a big fat ass."

I can just imagine the lawsuit filed against ETS by the Overweight High-Schoolers of America – "Ladies and gentlemen of the jury, the SAT clearly discriminates against the metabolically challenged." Sizzler would be named as a secondary defendant due to the intelligence-damaging effects of their all-you-can-eat shrimp and salad bar.

Are you kidding me here?!? What the hell kind of defense is saying that the guy put on weight?!? But it worked: Vaughn was acquitted of drunk driving and paid only the $100 fine for driving outside the lines.

But the best example had to be former Seahawk running back Lamar Smith. Smith, less than a month into a four-month sentence for a 1994 car accident in which a teammate was paralyzed from the waste down, was released from jail for 24 hours Tuesday so he could travel to New Orleans and sign a four-year, $7.1 million deal with the Saints.

When was the last time you heard about a guy who worked at McDonald's being temporarily released from prison because the fries were up? Or a farmer being let out because his cows need a milkin'?

The answer is never, because it doesn't happen. But Smith got out to sign his piece of paper. Why? Because he is a professional athlete.

I mean, God forbid the team should have to bring the contract to him. I guess they just wanted to avoid the heart-warming press conference in which he would hold up his new jersey and try it on over his orange prison jump-suit.

Justice may be blind, but her sense of touch is just fine, and she can feel the heat of bright-shining fame just like the rest of us.

MOSELLE

However, it wasn't always that way. In his first two years, Moselle suited up for just seven matches and received playing time in two.

The redshirt freshman spent most of the time playing with the third team behind the infamous "blue wall".

According to Scates, Moselle would work his way up to the second team and practice well, but before he would get the chance to play, he would falter.

"Some people adapt right away," Moselle said. "It took me at least my first two years to really get into the mental part to where I could go out there and play and have fun and compete and not just go out there and try to perform for the coach or for myself."

His inability to perform consistently contributed to the ups and downs he suffered during those first few years. The frustration he felt raised doubts as to whether or not he should continue with the program.

"There were many times during his first and second years when he wondered if he would ever get a chance to play," Gary Moselle said. "He was concerned that he would maybe go all the way through and play five years and never get the court time.

"He was very frustrated. Many times, he would call and say 'I really don't know what I should do. I'm just not living up to my own expectations.'

"I told him that it's better for him if he sticks it out. I hate to see him start something and give 100 percent and accept failure. I wanted him to do his very best, and as long as he loved, enjoyed it, wanted to do it, I wanted him to stick to it, but if it became a burden when he hated it that was the end. He shouldn't go any further."

Fortunately, Moselle did stick it out, and he had a breakthrough year in 1996. He began the year like previous years with little playing time. In fact, he was not suiting up for most matches. However, as the season progressed Moselle gained momentum and actually found time on the court, subbing in for Paul Nihipali. The playing time boosted his confidence, and Moselle would later play a key role in the championship run.

In the MPSF finals, Moselle replaced a struggling Matt Taylor. The Bruins went on to defeat Santa Barbara in a tight, five-game match to earn a berth to the Final Four.

"It was exciting," Moselle said. "I was nervous but Coach had faith in me. I needed to perform; some of the guys

W. BASKETBALL

The Bruins spent the summer in France playing in the Eurostars Tournament and came back a completely different team.

When UCLA takes on Arizona State tonight in Tempe, the Bruins will bring an 18-7 overall record and a 13-3 record in Pac-10 play with them into the University Activity Center.

The 13 conference victories are already the most in school history. With a sweep of the Arizona schools – they play No. 9 Arizona on Saturday – the Bruins can become the first UCLA team to capture 20 wins since the 1991-1992 team.

UCLA head coach Kathy Olivier attributes the experiences garnered during the European vacation for the huge turnaround this season.

"The Europe vacation has helped us in so many areas," Olivier said. "It helped our team chemistry, our confidence, in virtually every area."

One of these areas is the team's performance in close games. Last year, the Bruins were 0-4 in games that were decided by four points or less. This year UCLA is 4-2 in games that have been decided by the same margin.

The basketball vacation allowed the team to understand how to win in high-pressure situations.

"We now know what to do in the close games," said sophomore guard Marie Philman.

A case in point was the USC game on Jan. 23 in the Lyon Center. After playing lackadaisically for the entire game, the Bruins somehow found a way to win the match – which was competitive throughout – 68-64.

"(The Europe vacation) helped us in the USC game," Olivier said. "Even though we didn't have the best game, we knew we were going to win. Last year we would have lost that game, but this year, we have been beating teams in the close games."

The two-week experience in Europe has also improved the team's chemistry. The vacation gave the team a reason to hang out with each other, and in the process, they found out that they like each other. Any coach throughout the nation will tell you when a team gets along with each other, the team wins together.

"When you spend a lot of time with each other, you tend to play better," Olivier said. "They have respect for each other. They all know that they each can contribute in their own ways."

A symbol of this good chemistry on this team can be seen when the starters are plucked by Olivier during a game in favor of bench players. Olivier likes to go deep in her bench, going sometimes taking five players off the pine. But instead of pouting over minutes and points, the starters instead cheer their teammates on from the bench.

Another area that the vacation helped improve is the team's performance on the road. While the Bruins of a year ago were just 5-8 on the road, the current team has improved to an 8-3 away record this season. And two of the three road losses UCLA suffered have been to opponents ranked in the top 10: No. 7 North Carolina at Chapel Hill and No. 5 Stanford at Maples Pavilion.

"You usually go on the road, and it's tough to win," Olivier said. "The Europe road trip this summer helped us so much. Now the four days of the road trip go by so quick. In the past, the four days were so long."

When the Bruins travel to Tempe tonight and then to Tucson for Saturday's matchup against Arizona, the players will continue to draw from their European summer vacation for inspiration and guidance.

are in a position now where they should be considered for the tournament which says a lot about a team that was picked to finish ninth (in the conference)."

The distractions include losing head coach Bill Frieder before the season started and allegations of point shaving by former players. However, despite all the turmoil, the Sun Devils have compiled an 18-11 overall record and are tied for fifth in the conference with a mark of 8-8. Last year, Arizona State was10-20 overall and 2-16 in the Pac-10.

Helping ASU to its surprising season are senior Jeremy Veal, who averages 20.7 points, and juniors Bobby Lazor (17.3 points, 7.9 rebounds) and Mike Batiste (15.6 points, 7.9 boards).

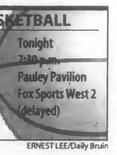
But while Arizona State enters the game with tournament aspirations, the Bruins want to use the last two conference games to prepare for their run in the March race.

"Both games are big just from the standpoint that at the end of the season, you want to gain some momentum for the NCAA tournament," Lavin said. "You want to be able to feel confident and feel good about yourselves."

Said senior Toby Bailey: "The good thing about this team is that we know what we have to do in order to win."

And what they will do in order to win is use their pressure defense.

UCLA got back into the game against Washington, taking a one point lead with two seconds left after being down by as much as 19 points thanks in large part to the press. (Though the Bruins would eventually lose on two last second UW free throws, 95-94.)



ERNEST LEE/Daily Bruin

The press forced 12 second half Husky turnovers. And the press upped the tempo of the game, allowing UCLA to get off 42 shot attempts in the second half as the Bruins scored 64 points in just one half.

"When we had Jelani (McCoy) we were looking at being more a power team, focusing on our size," Lavin said. "But now to offset the lack of size on our frontline, pressing is a kind of natural (strategy) and it also plays to the strength of this group of seven or eight players that are in the rotation.

"Now, I think that we're at a position where we can't afford not to press."

UCLA had a difficult time putting ASU away earlier this season, squeaking by the Devils 78-73 in Tempe.

were injured in my spot so I was able to step up, and we won the match in five.

"It was real close, but it was a real character builder and then I started in the semifinals when we played here in Pauley against Lewis. And we won in three and then my job was done. I really felt like I had something to do with the whole championship team, and I was proud.

"I felt like part of the team for the first time. I could really contribute. So yeah, that was amazing, and at that point, after winning a championship, I knew that I was satisfied for the moment at least."

Despite finding success late in the season, it was short-lived. After the championship, minor back injuries sidelined him during the summer, so > (Moselle's) ability to play two different positions has given the Bruins much flexibility in the lineup.

Moselle began fall into practice out of shape. He found himself in a very familiar position as January came around and the season got under way.

But the fact that he had been through the process of not suiting up and not playing before helped him to earn a starting spot a month later.

The Bruins would try a number of different players at the outside hitting doesn't show that confidence," sophomore All-American Katia Roubanova said.

Despite the opinion of her teammates, Cooper appears unafraid to voice her confidence in her ability.

"Right now I think I can compete with anybody in the country, and that makes me feel good," Cooper said. "I know that I'm not going to be blown off the court by anybody – I can adjust my game and stay in every match."

One thing is for sure, Cooper's teammates will be hoping that her confidence stays strong and that her play follows suit.

The expectations for this year's team are high despite the havoc that injuries have wrought.

As the team leader, Cooper is responsible for setting the tone for the team. With a rigorous Pac-10 schedule looming in the coming weeks ahead, Cooper and Co. need to ask themselves: how badly do they want to succeed?

SOFTBALL

Swenson (3-3) and Erin Weiler (5-1) both have the possibility of being effective against Fresno. Both Weiler and Swenson proved themselves in the Campbell/Cartier tournament.

Besides pitching, the Bruins bring to the tournament bats that are capable of getting clutch hits in Odom, who is batting .371, and first baseman Kim Wuest, who boasts a .394 average. Fritz's absence will be felt in the lineup, as the team struggles to fill the lead-off spot.

spot before Scates settled on Moselle.

The stability that Moselle brought to the team would help the Bruins go on an 18-match win streak, falling just a bit short of winning the national championship.

Unlike the previous years, Moselle began the 1998 season in good shape. He spent the summer playing volleyball and jump training.

By the time fall practice started, Moselle had added 20 pounds to his frame. The hard work over the summer has paid off since he has become the Bruins' most versatile starter.

His ability to play two different positions has given the Bruins much flexibility in the lineup as Moselle has played both opposite and outside this season.

"Ben's in a tough position 'cause he has to play more than one position," UCLA senior captain Tom Stillwell said. "If he is playing opposite for a couple weeks and he goes back to outside, it takes him a couple days to adjust, but he's such a good athlete; once he adjusts he's fine.

"He's got real good strength and a lot of jumping ability. Putting that together and all the experience on his fifth year, he's a great player out there. He's a major asset in our winning."

While Moselle has relied on his physical strength throughout much of his career, it is the development of a positive mental attitude over the last four years that has answered the question. Will he do it? The answer, as many opponents have seen is, yes, he will!

LAKERS

league history have recorded more than his 528 wins.

The Lakers opened the season with 11-straight wins, but are 28-18 since and have fallen into fourth place in the Western Conference. They were just 5-7 since the All-Star break entering Wednesday night's game.

However, they have been hampered by injuries, most notably to O'Neal, who missed 22 games due to a strained abdominal muscle, and point guard Nick Van Exel, who hasn't played since Feb. 15 due to an injured right knee.

Van Exel underwent diagnostic arthroscopic surgery last week and will be sidelined for at least two more weeks.

O'Neal, Kobe Bryant, Derek Fisher and Robert Horry all said there was no truth to a report by Fox Sports News that the players had voted 12-0 calling for Harris' dismissal.

"I'm the team captain, and I didn't call that meeting," O'Neal said. "So I don't know where they got that information from. All I can say is that it's yellow journalism.

"We have an organization that is being run by players that played the game and dominated the game," O'Neal said, referring to executives Jerry West and Mitch Kupchak. "And whatever Jerry and Mitch and (owner) Jerry Buss decide to do, I'm behind those guys because they run this organization, and we just play for them.

"But personally, I like Del; he's a good guy."

Harris shrugged off the report that he was about to be fired.

"There is pressure on all of us all the time to try to win as many games as possible," he said. "The only good news about (the report) is that the year that my Houston Rockets team went to the finals (1981), the New York papers had me fired four different times, so hopefully that will work out the same way this year.

"We're still in a good position at this point. ... What really will matter is what happens in the playoffs. So we've still got time to settle and make our best run during the playoffs."

6-7, 2-6.

USC's second point did not come without a struggle. Trojan George Bastl and Bruin freshman Jean-Noel Grinda claimed the longest match of the day, taking the third set to a tiebreaker.

Bastl jumped ahead with a 6-1 first set, while Grinda pocketed the second set 6-3. Bastl regained momentum in the tiebreak game to win 7-6.

The Trojans also managed to avoid the doubles sweep as USC's Kukal and Samayoa defeated Allegre and Sands 4-8.

But ultimately the doubles point belonged to the Bruins. Grinda and Breen pushed past Bastl and Spencer 8-6.

The No. 2 doubles team of Decret and Newman started slow, as USC's team of Gottesleben and Zaman pulled out 3-0. They stifled the Trojans' start, defeating them 8-5.

"It was by far our best match for both singles and doubles the whole year – a tremendous win for us," UCLA head coach Billy Martin said. "I'm tickled to death. I'm hoping this is going to be the turning point of our season."

So was it UCLA's win or USC's loss?

"They had nothing really to gain ... and everything to lose coming in here and playing us without (two of) our guys," said Martin.

On that note, the Bruins pulled out all the weapons to avenge a loss to USC earlier in the season.

"I knew things had to click for us for us to really pull it out like this and it did," Martin said.

suspension.

Sprewell's attorneys had argued that he was the first player to be penalized by both the league and a team for a serious transgression. His side argued that the collective bargaining agreement clearly states that a penalty in a case like this could be issued by either a team or the league, but not both.

Feerick rejected that argument.

Sprewell's side also argued that the one-year suspension was too severe when compared with previous penalties issued by the NBA. They also brought up cases of player-coach clashes in other sports in which penalties were issued by either the team or the league, but not both.

The NBA argued that the penalty was not excessive, given the nature of the attack. The league's security department interviewed 23 witnesses in two days and determined that Sprewell got into a fight with Carlesimo at practice and choked the coach, then returned some 20 minutes later and punched him.

The union disputed whether a punch landed in the second confrontation, but Feerick found that one did.

The Warriors argued that they had the right to terminate Sprewell's contract under Section 16 of the uniform player contract, which says players must "conform to standards of good citizenship and good moral character" and prohibits "engaging in acts of moral turpitude."

Feerick said the two attacks should be treated as one single altercation and that it did not constitute an act of moral turpitude.

Stern said that part of the ruling was "incomprehensible."

Big East underdogs rise to occasion

BASKETBALL: Rutgers, Georgetown survive oust, advancing to NCAA's

By Jack Curry
The New York Times

NEW YORK – Eric Clark gathered his teammates around him before Rutgers started the second half against West Virginia on Wednesday and shouted, "We can win this thing" over and over in the huddle.

With his bald head gleaming and his voice booming, Clark looked more like a preacher than a player. Actually, he proved to be a prophet.

Even an ardent Rutgers fan would have smirked at Clark's bold comment about handling the 23rd-ranked team in the country if it had been made before the game – or even with Rutgers ahead by seven at the half.

But the Scarlet Knights backed up every last syllable by shocking the 23rd-ranked Mountaineers, 72-65, in the first round of the Big East tournament at Madison Square Garden.

It was an afternoon for two underdogs to put some perspiration on the foreheads of two teams that still have aspirations of reaching the National Collegiate Athletic Association tournament.

Before 12th-seeded Rutgers defeated fifth-seeded West Virginia, Shernard Long and Boubacar Aw combined for 46 points as 13th-seeded Georgetown surprised fourth-seeded Miami, 62-56, to squash any chance the Hurricanes (18-9) had of advancing to the NCAA tournament. In the opener of the day session, eighth-seeded Providence whacked ninth-seeded Notre Dame, 72-55, eliminating the Irish (13-14) from any post-season consideration.

"This game meant a lot to me simply because I didn't want it to be my last game," said Clark, a senior forward at Rutgers, who scored 19 points. "And also we had never won a game in the tournament. So I really wanted to put forth my best effort to try and keep us here for tomorrow's game."

> "This game meant a lot to me ... I didn't want it to be my last game."
> Eric Clark
> Rutgers senior forward

As excited as Rutgers (13-14) was and as elated as Georgetown (15-13) was about bouncing Miami out of the Big East tournament for the fourth straight season, one of them won't be as happy Thursday because the two teams play in the second round at 2 p.m. Providence (13-15) planned to get a lot of sleep Wednesday night because it has the unenviable chore of facing top-seeded Connecticut (26-4), which had a bye in the first round, at noon.

"We're glad we're still alive," said Providence coach Pete Gillen, whose team lost to UConn by seven and by nine points this season and must rebound against the taller Huskies to even dream of an upset. "We'll give it our best chance. We'll be the big underdog, but we have a chance."

After Wednesday, maybe Gillen is right. Rutgers shot 42 percent from the field, missed 14 of 34 free throws and was outrebounded, 48-34, by West Virginia but still managed to topple its third-ranked opponent this season.

The Knights did it because Clark scored 14 in the first half and because Geoff Billett (17 points) had 10 during a 21-7 run that put them ahead, 63-55, with 3 minutes 48 seconds left. Meanwhile, the senior-dominated Mountaineers vanished, making only 36 percent of their shots.

"People had every right to believe we would come in here and pack it in," Billet said. "Put up a little fight and go away quietly."

Instead, West Virginia went quietly and must now wait until Sunday to see if 22 victories, including two against non-Division I schools, convince the selectors that the Mountaineers are tournament tough.

Last season, coach Gale Catlett gave a futile soliloquy about why his 19-9 team belonged after it lost in the Big East tournament. But Wednesday when asked if he thought West Virginia (22-8) should be in this season, he said, "I have no idea."

> "We're glad we're still alive. We'll give it our best chance."
> Pete Gillen
> Providence coach

Miami coach Leonard Hamilton should not be as befuddled. The Hurricanes will be gazing at an National Invitation Tournament bid after stumbling against a Georgetown team that has lost four crucial players this season.

But the Hoyas had Long, who poured in 24 points, Aw, who muscled his way to 22 and a pressure defense; that was more than enough. Long drilled a 16-foot jumper from the left corner with 1:48 remaining to nudge the lead to 59-55 and secure the game.

Providence used a smothering pressure defense to rattle Notre Dame and limit Pat Garrity to 18 points. The Friars are much different from the team that reached the NCAA elite eight before losing to the eventual champion, Arizona, in overtime last season.

Four stalwarts from the team are gone, but Wednesday they received 17 points each from Jamel Thomas and Justin Farley and never trailed. So Providence lived on for another day at the Garden.

"It means a lot to play here," Thomas said. "This is where Michael Jordan got his 55 points and all that. And I'm a Knicks fan."

All's not well with Sprewell case

BASKETBALL: Ex-Warrior gets suspension cut but had wanted free agency

By Chris Sheridan
The Associated Press

NEW YORK – Latrell Sprewell won a double victory today when an arbitrator ruled that the Golden State Warriors must reinstate his contract, and the NBA must reduce his one-year suspension for attacking his coach.

Sprewell's NBA-imposed suspension will end July 1, five months earlier than the league wanted, and he will be paid $16.3 million over the next two seasons.

"The arbitrator is a very charitable man, and he made a charitable decision in respects to Mr. Sprewell in this decision," commissioner David Stern said.

After choking Warriors coach P.J. Carlesimo during practice Dec. 1, Sprewell had his contract terminated by the team and was suspended for one year by Stern – the longest non-drug-related penalty in league history.

Stern cited the "premeditated" nature of the attack, but arbitrator John Feerick rejected that characterization.

"The evidence indicates that there is no history of both the league and a team imposing discipline for the same violent conduct, on or off the court," Feerick wrote in his decision. "This speaks to the issue of fairness, as I see it."

"I note that the loss of 68 games and $6.4 million exceeds the total of all suspensions imposed on all players for physical altercations during the 1995-96 and 1996-97 seasons combined, and all suspensions imposed for altercations during the 1992-92, 1993-94 and 1994-95 seasons combined.

"I find that a penalty of 68 games is commensurate with the severity of the misconduct, addresses the wrong done to the head coach and conveys a message that violence in the NBA will be dealt with severely but always with due regard to principles of fairness," Feerick wrote.

The reinstatement of Sprewell's contract means he will be paid over the final two years of his contract, although he still will lose $6.4 million in 1997-98 salary.

The Warriors will be free to trade him, if they so choose, at the conclusion of their current season.

"The reinstatement is probably going to make two parties unhappy – Mr. Sprewell and Golden State," Stern said. "In fact, we have reason to believe Sprewell was looking forward to free agency.

"The worst thing that could have happened would be if he were allowed to perform for another team this season and then go to the playoffs or the finals," Stern said.

Sprewell and the players' union had argued that the penalties imposed by the Warriors and the NBA were both unduly harsh and unprecedented.

The arbitrator upheld many of the NBA's arguments, but the bottom line was that he felt the punishment was excessive.

"This decision is a victory that is shared by Latrell and the other 400 members of our union. It reaffirms the sanctity of guaranteed contracts in the NBA," union President Billy Hunter said.

Sprewell's agent, Arn Tellem, said: "We are happy Latrell has his contract back."

"As playing basketball is one of the great joys in Latrell's life, we are disappointed that he will not be able to resume his NBA career until July 1," Tellem said. "Nonetheless, Latrell has already apologized for the incident and he is anxious to put this entire experience behind him."

The Warriors did not immediately comment on the ruling, although the team said there may be a statement later in the day.

His return is subject to the NBA receiving assurances from Sprewell and the player's association that he will control and manage his temper, according to the ruling by Feerick, dean of the Fordham University law school.

Sprewell's suspension had already become the longest in NBA history.

He has missed 44 games since he was suspended Dec. 3 by the 12-46 Warriors, who are tied for last place in the Pacific Division.

He remains barred from the Warriors' team facilities and NBA arenas until July 1.

At his arbitration hearing, a total of 21 witnesses testified over four days in Portland, Ore., during the final week of January and four more days in New York during the first week of February.

He filed two grievances, one against the Warriors for terminating the remaining three years of his four-year, $32 million contract, the other against the league for imposing the one-year

Angels rookie Troy Glaus shows promise for team

BASEBALL: Anaheim player starts season as an astounding first baseman

The Associated Press

PEORIA, Ariz. – When Troy Glaus remembers to bat, he's been something special for the Anaheim Angels so far this spring.

The rookie from UCLA smacked his third home run of the spring during Wednesday's 9-7, 10th-inning loss to the Mariners. He took a Bill Swift fastball high over the fence in left center in the fourth inning, giving him three of the first four Angel homers this season.

"We sure like him, and he's displayed the power we know he has," Anaheim manager Terry Collins said. "That ball he hit today, that didn't just carry over a fence. He hit that thing hard."

Glaus, who was drafted in June but didn't sign a contract until the late fall, is expected to start the season in Class AA.

Dave Hollins is penciled in as the everyday first baseman in Anaheim this season.

But he didn't have a perfect day. Glaus forgot to take his turn at bat in the eighth inning when he thought he had been removed from the game. The Angels wound up skipping his spot in the batting order – something that is overlooked with a wink in spring training.

Starting pitcher Allen Watson scattered three hits over three scoreless innings but didn't get away completely unscathed. He took a line-drive rocket from Seattle's Edgar Martinez off the back of his right thigh before he recovered to get the out.

> (Troy Glaus has) displayed the power we know he has."

> Anaheim Angels manager

"If that had happened last year, I wouldn't have felt it because I was so fat," said Watson, who is sporting a lean body thanks to a rigorous off-season program. "I felt good today. They have a great lineup, and holding them without a run makes you feel good."

Reliever Shigatoshi Hasegawa wasn't as fortunate. He allowed a solo home run to David Segui in the fourth inning and extra base hits to Joey Cora, Alex Rodriguez, Ken Griffey Jr. and Martinez during a three-run fifth inning.

Pitcher Jack McDowell reported no problems in is throwing on the side Wednesday and is still on track to make his Angels' debut Sunday against the Arizona Diamondbacks.

Lakers refute reports that Coach Harris is out of a job

NBA: Despite rumors, fall in standings, no plans for leadership changes exist

By John Nadel
The Associated Press

INGLEWOOD – The Los Angeles Lakers refuted reports Wednesday that coach Del Harris was about to be fired.

The New York Daily News reported Wednesday that the Lakers, coming off a disappointing 3-3 road trip, were about to fire Harris and replace him on an interim basis with assistant Larry Drew.

"We have no plans at this time to make any coaching change," public relations director John Black said Wednesday – several hours before the Lakers faced the Indiana Pacers to begin a four-game homestand. "Beyond that, we're not going to comment on media speculation."

In addition, All-Star Shaquille O'Neal defended Harris and said the slumping Lakers "weren't in a desperate situation."

Harris, 60, is in his fourth season as coach of the Lakers and 13th season as an NBA coach. His teams have an overall regular-season record of 528-448, and only 17 coaches in

Golfer's right to ride cart doesn't stop his game

By Denne H. Freeman
The Associated Press

AUSTIN, Texas – Casey Martin rediscovered his lost golf game.

The disabled golfer, who hasn't played much because of his lawsuit against the PGA Tour, showed Wednesday in a Pro-Am for the Greater Austin Open why he's a threat to leave the Nike Tour and join the big-time.

Despite high winds on the Jack Nicklaus-designed Hills of Lakeway course, Martin drove well, hit beautiful knock-down iron shots and chipped and putted solidly. Worried about his "rusty" game, Martin was 1-under-par for 15 holes – but that was all he played. His Pro-Am team was pulled off the course because it had exceeded a 4 1/2-hour limit.

Tournament official Bob Hyde made the decision just as Martin was to hit a 7-iron on the 173-yard par-3 waterfall hole, played as No. 16 in the tournament. Martin, playing in his first event since a federal magistrate ruled Feb. 11 he could use a cart because of a damaged left leg, said, "I've already teed my ball up. Can't we play this hole?"

Hyde said no, so Martin limped around signing autographs for his playing partners and spectators. "I'm very optimistic about my play now," Martin said. "I only hit one bad drive today."

Martin's sudden fame has brought a cascade of endorsements and appearances on national television. "I imagine the love affair will last as long as I play well," said Martin, who won the first Nike event of the year, then missed the cut in the second one. "It will fade quickly if I don't play good. It all depends now on the scores I shoot. I have money now. It's not astronomical, but it's great for me. Right now I'm David going against Goliath."

When play starts Thursday, Martin can use his cart under certain restrictions. PGA Tour official Jim Duncan said Martin "can't have a roof on his cart or be protected from the elements. He can carry anything in the cart that you normally would on the golf course like a towel or a water bottle."

Martin can drive on the fairway until such a point where the elements come into play. "If it rains, he would have to stay on the cart path," Duncan said.

Martin, who passed on a sponsor's exemption at the Doral-Ryder Open this week, said he is eager to get his game to a point where it is ready for the regular PGA Tour. "I do have the talent to be successful," Martin said. "But I have to get better. It's still up in the air how good I am."

Eric Johnson, who won the last Nike event, said Martin's game is good enough for the regular tour. "He hits it a long way, and he hits it right to left," Johnson said. "His disability helps him in a way because he keeps his lower legs quiet on the backswing. He has nice balance."

Johnson said the question of preserving energy by riding a cart is overplayed. "It doesn't matter how you get to the golf ball," he said. "You still have to get out and hit it."

On Thursday, Martin is paired with two former members of the PGA Tour, Mike Sullivan and Robin Freeman.

Casey Martin, the disabled golfer who legally won the right to ride a golf cart, begins play Thursday in the Greater Austin Open.

WATER POLO: Balancing studies, team responsibilities somewhat difficult going into tournament

By Avi Lidgi
Daily Bruin Contributor

With midterms just around the corner, the UCLA women's water polo team is buckling down, preparing themselves for the ever-difficult task of balancing their athletic responsibilities with their academic ones.

They're doing this the best way they know how.

"We're going to Hawaii this weekend," head coach Guy Baker said.

The University of Hawaii will be hosting a four-team meet this weekend, giving the 9-1 Bruins a chance to prove their resilience in the wake of a deflating 9-8 loss at the hands of arch-rival Cal. A loss, says Baker, that has not yet taken the wind out of the Bruin sails.

"We still think if we play our game, we can win," he said. "It was a close game that we would have liked to win, but we still feel we can do very well this weekend."

> "Because (Cal is) always on top, and so are we, it's a pretty big rivalry."
> Guy Baker
> Head coach

Facing their first conference opponents, UCLA will look to begin where they left off before Cal snapped their 38-game winning streak.

Curiously, it is perennial water-polo powerhouse Cal, and only Cal, that can boast of defeating UCLA in the past three years, a stretch that has seen the Bruins go 69-3 since 1996.

"They're our real rivals," said Baker about Cal. "I mean, UCLA-USC, sure that's a big rivalry, but because (Cal is) always on top, and so are we, it's a pretty big rivalry."

Facing teams like Hawaii, Michigan and UCSB, the Bruins figure to have their hands full, despite being the clear favorite coming into the tournament.

"Anytime you play a conference game, it's important to come ready to play," said Baker. "We still feel we can win the championship this year."

While Hawaii should provide a much-needed respite for the midterm-mired Bruins, assistant coach Adam Krikorian is quick to point out that they do not take their mission there lightly. With the specter of midterms looming when most of them return, much of their time off in the land of scintillating sunsets and breathtaking beaches will be spent, well ...

"They'll do a lot of, um, studying," Baker said, tongue-in-cheek.

Before heading abroad, the team must handle all affairs domestic, and tonight that means taking care of business at the hostile confines of the USC pool.

The team may be without senior standout Catherine von Schwarz, who suffered brain leakage after an injury to her nose in practice left her questionable for tonight's contest.

"It's not as bad as we thought, and we should have her available for the 'SC game," noted Baker.

Although the depth of this year's team makes the Bruins a tough matchup, the absence of von Schwarz will make the Bruins shorthanded on the attack: "She's important offensively. I mean, it's like taking Kareem Abdul-Jabbar out of the lineup," said Baker, referring to another former Bruin standout who, at times, also seems to be suffering from brain leakage of his own. (Remember lawsuit waged over name rights. Puleeeze.)

Victory bodes well for Bruins as UCLA prepares to face USC

W. TENNIS: Despite unfortunate injuries, players pull it all together to win key matches

By Jared Hummel
Daily Bruin Contributor

Call it a warm-up for Southern Cal.

The UCLA women's tennis team battered around the Broncos of Boise State yesterday at the Sunset Recreation Center, 8-1.

The Bruins had hoped to iron out some of the problem areas which have hurt their play of late.

They appeared to have done this adequately.

"It was an impressive victory; we are getting better and improving," UCLA head coach Stella Sampras said. "It was a great match to get us ready for USC on Saturday."

> UCLA will travel to USC on Saturday in what will undoubtedly be another addition to the storied rivalry.

A recent string of injuries have plagued this Bruin team, leading to a mild losing streak where they dropped three of four. UCLA lost two of three in Madison, Wis., at the U.S. Tennis Association and the Intercollegiate Tennis Association Tournament and fell to Pepperdine on the road on Feb. 27.

The spotlight recently has been on sophomore Katia Roubanova, the team's No. 1 doubles player and a returning All-American. She is trying to overcome a foot injury which had kept her out of the first six dual matches.

And it seems as though she is well on her way to recovery as she notched a victory, along with her partner sophomore Elizabeth Schmidt, over Boise State's No. 1 duo of Pia-Lena Ander and Taryn Weir-Smith.

"Doubles played really well today, especially Katia Roubanova," Sampras said. "She is feeling a lot more confident, and she's getting better and better."

In singles action, the Bruins dominated, winning five of six. No. 1 sophomore player Annica Cooper easily won her 11th match in 12 tries as she bettered senior Manon Buskens.

Schmidt rebounded from a recent slide by defeating freshman Pia-Lena Ander 6-3, 6-2, and senior Kelly Rudolph was the usual solid No. 4 player beating senior Anita Pearson 6-3, 6-0.

The only blemish on the singles front came from freshman Cristina Popescu who fell 6-2, 6-1 in the competitive No. 2 slot. However, Popescu was playing No. 2 for the first time this season – since returning from a hamstring pull, she has ascended to this position from No. 5.

UCLA will travel to USC on Saturday in what will undoubtedly be another addition to the storied rivalry. Their last meeting, on Feb. 13, came down to the final doubles match before being decided in a tight win by Brandi Freudenberg and Popescu, 5-4.

MEN'S TENNIS: Close calls give way to solid victory against crosstown rival

By Stephanie Chan
Daily Bruin Contributor

Another sequel to "Scream" debuted at the Los Angeles Tennis Center yesterday. Call it "Grunt," starring the No. 2 UCLA men's tennis team.

The "never-dying bad guy" in this flick was crosstown rival USC. UCLA ultimately disposed of the Trojans 5-2, but only after playing to three sets in four of the six singles matches.

These were not grunts of fear, though. They were grunts of intensity and determination.

Freshman Noah Newman was the first to come off the battlefield after slaying Trojan Akram Zaman, 6-2, 6-2.

"I felt the intensity of the rivalry," said Newman of his first match against USC.

For senior Matt Breen this could have been his last match against USC. Breen had the presence of a veteran coming back from a 2-6 first-set loss to USC's Kyle Spencer to win the last two sets 6-3, 6-4.

"We've got two starters out ... For us to win today convincingly like that (makes) me really proud of our guys," Breen said. "They all came through and gave it their best."

"Convincingly's" middle name is Vince. Junior Vince Allegre convinced USC that the match was over, putting point No. 4 up for the Bruins.

USC's Patrick Gottesleben kept looking for the comeback, but Allegre eventually took the match, 6-3, 4-6, 6-3.

"I felt very comfortable because we had a big crowd, and it helped me a lot through the tough times," said Allegre.

Alex Decret added padding to the Bruin victory running past USC's Roman Kukal 6-2 in the third set after a 6-3 first set and 3-6 second set.

The Trojans did manage to slip out of Bruin territory with 2 singles victories.

USC's Fernando Samayoa put the Trojans on the board defeating a frustrated redshirt freshman Chris Sands,

Tough times abound as UCLA heads for tourney

SOFTBALL: Bruins say injuries, probation won't shake their team's spirit

By Kimberly Edds
Daily Bruin Contributor

Tough times just got tougher for the UCLA softball team.

As if playing without the benefit of five returners who decided to redshirt the 1998 season because of the team's suspension from the NCAA tournament was not enough, lead-off hitter and starting second baseman Laurie Fritz dislocated her shoulder sliding into second in Saturday's Alumni game.

This injury will most likely prevent Fritz from starting at second when the team plays Indiana in the Fresno State Classic today.

"That's a big hole for us to fill in terms of leadership, offensive attack and defensive play," Enquist said.

Versatile freshman Casey Hiraiwa is the probable candidate to fill in at second when UCLA faces Indiana, Tennessee, Kansas and Fresno State in the tournament this weekend, all of which, with the exception of Indiana, are ranked in the top 25.

There is another hole in the Bruin roster this weekend. Senior centerfielder Danielle Martin is ill and will not make the trip with the team.

No. 2 Fresno State looks to be UCLA's toughest competition in the tournament, but Enquist and her team refuse to look past their first opponent, Indiana.

"I think that we just have to take it one day at a time, one game at a time," senior shortstop Nicole Odom said.

Tennessee, Kansas and Indiana all have the advantage of experience over UCLA. The Bruins hope to counter with hard work and determination.

If the team's performance in the final two games in the Campbell/Cartier Classic last weekend is any indication, UCLA will be in every game.

ERNEST LEE/Daily Bruin

After dropping the first four games, the Bruins came out strong to shut out San Diego State 8-0 and Eastern Michigan 3-0. The tournament provided an opportunity for a young UCLA team to expose their weaknesses and learn from their mistakes.

UCLA is going to have to execute on both offense and defense if they want to be competitive against Fresno, which is a very balanced team with experience and depth.

Lakers 104, Pacers 95

Shaquille O'Neal had 29 points, including a surprising 13-of-15 from the foul line Wednesday night as the Los Angeles Lakers, perhaps stung by reports that their coach was about to be fired, beat the Indiana Pacers 104-95.

The Lakers snapped a two-game losing streak with just their sixth win in 13 games since the All-Star break, a slump prompting a newspaper report that coach Del Harris was on the verge of being dismissed.

However, team spokesman John Black said before the game that the team had "no plans at this time to make any coaching change."

O'Neal made 8-of-12 field goals and had 12 rebounds.

O'Neal entered the game having made 49.6 percent of his free throws.

Reggie Miller led the Pacers with 24 points. Rik Smits added 19, but fouled out with 8:36 left in the game. He was limited to 15 minutes due to foul trouble.

Kings 109, Pistons 89

Corliss Williamson scored a career-high 40 points as the Sacramento Kings ended their seven-game losing streak with a 109-89 victory over the Detroit Pistons on Wednesday night.

Williamson, who surpassed his previous career high by the end of the third quarter, hit 16-of-23 shots – several against Grant Hill – and all but one of his nine free throws. He added five rebounds and five assists.

Mitch Richmond, held to six points in the first three periods, had 11 in the final quarter for the Kings. The Pistons were held without a field goal for the opening 5:56 of the fourth quarter.

Warriors 90, Spurs 83

After losing the Latrell Sprewell arbitration case, the Golden State Warriors came back to the court and won.

Playing hours after an arbitrator reinstated the last two years of Sprewell's contract and reduced his one-year suspension by five months, the Warriors beat the San Antonio Spurs 90-83 Wednesday night, snapping their four-game losing streak.

Jim Jackson led the Warriors with a season-high 26 points and Donyell Marshall and Erick Dampier had 17 apiece to help the Warriors beat the Spurs for the first time in three meetings this season.

Tim Duncan had a career-high 35 points and David Robinson had 18 but San Antonio could not overcome a season-high 30 turnovers, leading to 31 Golden State points.

Red Wings 2, Mighty Ducks 0

Kevin Hodson earned his third career shutout with 35 saves and Brent Gilchrist scored a power-play goal as the Detroit Red Wings edged the Anaheim Mighty Ducks 2-0 Wednesday night.

The Stanley Cup champs, who won three overtime games during their sweep of Anaheim in the second round of last year's playoffs, scored at 14:44 of the first period. Tomas Sandstrom was sent off for tripping Sergei Fedorov, and Gilchrist redirected a one-timer from 50 feet in the slot for his 13th goal – three more than he had in 67 games last season for Dallas.

With both teams starting backup goaltenders and the Ducks missing marquee players Teemu Selanne and Paul Kariya, the game lacked most of the intensity of last year's playoff battle.

MEN'S BASKETBALL

He's baaaack!

For his efforts last weekend, which included his second-half performance at Washington, also known as the Toby Bailey Show, the senior guard/forward earned Pac-10 Player of the Week Honors.

Bailey admitted to being mentally drained after the 84-81 Stanford loss on Feb. 12, during which he turned the ball over in the waning seconds when UCLA (21-7 overall, 11-5 Pac-10) had a chance to tie. However, in the second half of the UW game last Sunday, Bailey stowed away any mental baggage left from the Cardinal game.

Bailey scored a career-high 32 points in the 95-94 loss to the Huskies, all of which were in the second half. Bailey was instrumental in the 19th-ranked Bruins' almost comeback.

After missing all three of his field goal attempts in the first half, Bailey went on a tear in the second and made 13 of 17. He also had three offensive rebounds, four assists and three steals in his magical half.

His 32 points in one half ties the great Lew Alcindor's (now, Kareem Abdul-Jabbar) UCLA record for most points scored in a half.

"Toby was in one of those zones – the Toby Bailey zone," UCLA head coach Steve Lavin said. "He had it in the national championship game, and he's had it at points, but this was a sustained 20 minutes where he was at a whole other level. What I said during that half was that, 'Bailey is back.'"

And the All-District nomination goes to ...

Though there are still two games left in the season and a whole lot of madness in March to go, two year-end awards have already been announced.

The National Association of Basketball Coaches and General Motors have named their Division I All-District Teams. UCLA had two players designated on the District 15 First Team with seniors J. R. Henderson and Toby Bailey given the nods. Meanwhile, two other Bruin players, senior Kris Johnson and freshman Baron Davis, were named to the second team.

Davis was also honored by Basketball Times. He was listed as a member of the All-Freshman first team. Joining the Bruin on the rookie squad were Khalid El-Amin of Connecticut, Wake Forest's Robert O'Kelley, St. Louis Billiken Larry Hughes and Iowa State's Marcus Fizer.

The finalists were announced on Tuesday for the John R. Wooden Player of the Year Award and Henderson remains on the list, along with front runners Antawn Jamison of North Carolina and Kansas' Paul Pierce and Raef LaFrentz.

All I need to know I learned in Seattle

UCLA may have returned home from Seattle with an L, but that's not all the team brought home with them.

"I think that the second half against Washington is a great reference point for us," Lavin said. "Coming back from 18 down to that one point lead with two seconds to play against a quality opponent on the road, there are just so many things that you can draw from that."

"On a more practical standpoint, Rico (Hines), Travis (Reed) and Billy (Knight), now with a game and an experience like that, that's building their confidence for the next game," Lavin continued. It also makes our team realize that they can be successful without Jelani and they can find a way to compete with an on-the-road, quality opponent without Jelani to neutralize or offset our lack of size or strength underneath the basket or the depth-ness issue, Lavin added.

Rallying with Cooper

PROFILE: Singles player fills in top position with finesse, humble success

By Jared Hummel
Daily Bruin Contributor

What does a Division IA college tennis coach do coming into a season with a No. 2 preseason national ranking, playing in arguably the most competitive conference in the country, when the team's No. 1 player, who happens to be a NCAA contender, goes down with an injury before the first match?

Answer: He/she hopes that the team has enough depth to pick up the slack, he/she wishes for a little luck, and, most importantly, he/she hopes that a player can fill in the No. 1 spot and play consistently well.

This was the predicament laid at the feet of UCLA head coach Stella Sampras just 45 days ago.

And sophomore Annica Cooper was the godsend that Sampras had hoped for.

Competing predominantly in the No. 3 position last season, Cooper has had little problem making the transition to the top spot.

"In the beginning (of the season) I started playing No. 1 and maybe people didn't think I'd win as many matches as I have, so there wasn't much pressure," Cooper said. "I just feel like I'm having so many opportunities and chances that I've never had before to play top players."

Cooper has fared extremely well against these top players. So far this season she has played seven nationally ranked opponents and won six of those matches. Among Cooper's list of casualties are: William and Mary's Lauren Nikolaus, nationally ranked 12th, whom Cooper decisively beat 6-2, 6-4; Pepperdine's Zsofia Csapo, ranked 35th and Arizona State's Reka Cseresnyes, ranked 38th.

The only blemish on her 10-1 record was a loss to No. 3 Agnes Muzamel of Mississippi in the USTA/ITA Indoor Tournament.

"I think she's done a great job stepping up into that No. 1 spot," Sampras said. "She goes out and doesn't let things bother her – she's cool out there."

"Playing No. 1 is so tough because you're playing the best player from every school," senior Kelly Rudolph said. "Every match, no matter what school you play, it's going to be tough. She's so solid – she's only lost once."

In collegiate tennis, a team's doubles game is very important, as it is the deciding factor in a close match. Cooper finished last season with a 13-4 dual match doubles record and currently holds a 7-2 mark this season, typically playing in the No. 2 slot.

Unlike most tennis players at the college level, Cooper plays effectively in both singles and doubles. In fact, she is a returning All-American in the latter.

"She contributes in both singles and doubles – our doubles would not be as strong without her," Sampras said. "She's certainly contributed a lot to the program and helping us with our matches."

Born in Chicago, Cooper grew up as a loyal Bulls fan, more specifically, a Michael Jordan fan; as such, she likes to pattern her tennis game after his basketball game.

"You have to look at the individual things (Jordan) does so well, and how even in games against the worst teams, he still scores 40 points," Cooper said. "That really helps me when we're playing lesser opponents, and I always think about what he would do and how he would improve his game – I then think about how I have to improve my game."

"The way he comes through in clutch situations, always making the shot at the final buzzer and knowing that he's still aggressive in situations – that's what you have to do; you can't be defensive," Cooper added.

Like Jordan, Cooper has an exciting style. Where Jordan ignites the crowd with a lightning-fast cross-over dribble, freezing the defender en route to a dunk, Cooper plays a high-tempo serve and volley game.

Instead of playing conservatively at the baseline, engaging in a drawn-out rally style of tennis, Cooper often gambles with her hard serve and follows with an approach to the net where she practically dares her opponent to beat her.

DERRICK KUDO

Playing in the No. 1 slot, Annica Cooper has come through for UCLA.

"There aren't many college players who can serve and volley, and she does it and does it very well," Sampras said. "She handles the pressure well. She's cool and takes things in stride."

Unlike His Airness, Cooper is not a professional quite yet, but consistent with her desire for challenge, she plans on challenging herself after graduation by continuing her tennis.

"If I'm still enjoying (tennis) as much as I have been, I know my dad has said that he'd be willing if I wanted to try the pro tour and go for a year or just see what happens and play some tournaments," Cooper said. "I think it would be fun just to see."

Cooper's Bruin teammates regard her as a quiet and modest person despite her success.

"I think even though she's No. 1, although she's a very confident person; she's not big-headed and she

Ben Moselle has worked hard to combat the emotional challenges of volleyball competition.

VOLLEYBALL: Attitude makes all the difference for this talented senior

By Grace Wen
Daily Bruin Staff

For Ben Moselle, it has never been a question of "can he do it?" but a question of "will he do it?"

UCLA's senior outside hitter has always had the athletic ability, but finding the mental strength has been his greatest challenge.

As a youngster, Moselle participated in many sports. His physical talent was never in doubt, but his emotional state was somewhat questionable.

"Ben had physical ability that exceeded his emotional capacity," said Moselle's father Gary. "I can remember one time when he was playing little league and he was 8 or 9 years old, and it was a very pivotal game. He was a pitcher, and there were probably 100 people watching him, and for a 9-year-old it's very difficult. He was standing on the mound, and I realized that there were tears rolling down his cheeks, and I couldn't understand what was wrong.

"The coach walked out to the mound and talked with Ben, and gave him a little pat. When the coach came back to the dugout I said, 'What's wrong?' And the coach said 'Ben wants me to take him out. He doesn't want to do this anymore. He just wants to escape the mound.' But Ben completed the game and he did well. He lived up to his own expectations, but he didn't enjoy the pressure."

Although Moselle no longer plays baseball, his volleyball career has taken a similar route.

A successful player in high school, the 6-foot-4-inch senior from Encinitas came to UCLA as a recruited walk-on. He saw little playing time his first two years, but with hard work and perseverance, Moselle has become a starter for the team.

"He's one of our most solid players," UCLA head coach Al Scates said. "He's hitting so much better than he was as a junior that we need him in the lineup because he does a lot of little things. He sets the off ball, he digs well, his serve can take a match over, when his serve gets hot. So he's a complete player, and he can play left, right, or opposite. He's very versatile."

Hi there, the voice of morality here, come to air my indignation.

In case you somehow missed it, Latrell Sprewell won his arbitration case against the NBA and his former/current team yesterday.

Arbitrator John Feerick cut the league's suspension from a year to seven months and ruled that the Golden State Warriors must cover the remaining two years and $16.3 million on Spree's contract.

Feerick did add the condition that Spree and the union must give assurances that he will manage his temper.

Don't laugh, he could be on to something here: who needs prisons as long as criminals promise not to do it ever again? And make no mistake, Latrell Sprewell is a criminal.

As of now, the score stands Johnnie Cochran 2, Justice 0.

In case you've forgotten the details, a quick summary: Spree and his coach get into an argument during practice, Spree chokes the coach, is pulled off by teammates and reportedly storms off to the team's brass to demand a trade. Then, 20 minutes or so later, he returns and attacks the coach again.

None of these facts were disputed by Cochran or Sprewell, who simply argued that he failed to land a punch during the second attack.

In the week following the incident, the league suspended Spree for a year,

PREVIEW: No. 23 Bruins will rendezvous with Arizona State in Tempe

What a difference a little vacation makes.

Last year at this time, the No. 23 UCLA women's basketball team was just 12-13 overall (including a 5-8 record on the road) and a dismal 6-10 in the Pac-10. The Bruins of 1997 were plagued by inconsistency, poor chemistry and their inability to pull out a close game all year long.

So they took a vacation. A European vacation.

They were once the roll-overs of the conference – a game against Arizona State was practically an automatic win, just as long as you put five players on the floor.

My, how things have changed.

When the No. 19 UCLA men's basketball team (21-7 overall, 11-5 Pac-10) attempts to claim its 18th straight victory over the Sun Devils tonight at Pauley Pavilion, it will face a team that knocked out Pac-10 giant No. 11 Stanford, came within one point of blemishing No. 2 Arizona's unbeaten conference record, and gave national powerhouse No. 3 Kansas an overtime scare.

The Bruins will also be tipping off against a team that wants to prove it deserves one of the 64 tournament spots.

"You can definitely build a case for Arizona State being a team that should be in the NCAA Tournament," UCLA head coach Steve Lavin said. "I think that (ASU head coach) Don Newman has done a tremendous job considering all the distractions. They

What a difference a little vacation makes.

Last year at this time, the No. 23 UCLA women's basketball team was just 12-13 overall (including a 5-8 record on the road) and a dismal 6-10 in the Pac-10. The Bruins of 1997 were plagued by inconsistency, poor chemistry and their inability to pull out a close game all year long.

So they took a vacation. A European vacation.

M.BASKETBALL: Players hope pressure defense will defeat rising Sun Devils, prepare them for NCAA tournament

By Emmanuelle Ejercito
Daily Bruin Senior Staff

They were once the roll-overs of the conference – a game against Arizona State was practically an automatic win, just as long as you put five players on the floor.

My, how things have changed.

When the No. 19 UCLA men's basketball team (21-7 overall, 11-5 Pac-10) attempts to claim its 18th straight victory over the Sun Devils tonight at Pauley Pavilion, it will face a team that knocked out Pac-10 giant No. 11 Stanford, came within one point of blemishing No. 2 Arizona's unbeaten conference record, and gave national powerhouse No. 3 Kansas an overtime scare.

The Bruins will also be tipping off against a team that wants to prove it deserves one of the 64 tournament spots.

"You can definitely build a case for Arizona State being a team that should be in the NCAA Tournament," UCLA head coach Steve Lavin said. "I think that (ASU head coach) Don Newman has done a tremendous job considering all the distractions. They

UC Merced construction raises questions

EDUCATION: Rising costs, innovative curriculum already posing problems

By Brian Fishman
Daily Bruin Contributor

Faculty concerns and funding problems are plaguing UC Merced, even in the planning stages.

The new campus is scheduled to open in 2005 with 1,000 students. In the ensuing years 1,000 students will be added each year before capping out at 20-25,000 students.

UC Merced is expected to handle a predicted increase of 60,000 UC applicants in the next 10 to15 years.

The statewide academic senate, in their meeting on Feb. 24, expressed several major reservations about the Merced campus, including the experimental nature of the undergraduate academic program.

"It will be a broadbased undergraduate program. There will be no particular majors. This caused a lot of problems for us," said Chand Viswanathan, Chair of the UCLA Academic Senate.

Viswanathan is concerned about an academic planning committee that called for three general areas of study for UC Merced students rather than specific majors. The areas are Social Science and Public Policy, Science and Technology and Arts and Culture. The committee's recommendations are not final.

"We'll derive something from the committee, but not until we see what the faculty and the (UC) campuses say," said Karen Merritt, a director of Academic Planning. "It's not set in concrete that this will take place."

Without a specific degree, graduates of UC Merced may have trouble competing with other graduates who have specific fields of expertise, Viswanathan suggested in a letter to UC Academic Council leader Sandra Weiss.

Viswanathan suggested that building a strong, traditional academic program that would attract students would be better than an experimental approach.

"If you want to experiment, a new campus is not the place to do it," he said.

But Viswanathan insisted that the Merced campus can be a useful addition to the UC system.

"We need an outstanding faculty and an outstanding academic program. These two things will make (the Merced campus) a jewel," Viswanathan said.

The Senate also worried that the emphasis on electronics at the new campus was driving costs too high.

"The financial support for the highly ambitious academic plans is not there. Will they take money from the existing campuses?" Viswanathan asked.

Students protest against U.S. sanctions on Iraq in front of Kerckhoff Hall Thursday.

Students voice opposition to sanctions

RALLY: Various groups unite to send message that U.S. policy toward Iraq results in children's deaths

By Barbara Ortutay
Daily Bruin Contributor

Students concerned with the situation in Iraq demonstrated on Thursday that one doesn't have to belong to a specific student group to be politically active.

The protest against U.S. sanctions in Iraq attracted, at various times, 50 to 200 onlookers. About 80 students actively participated in the rally in front of Kerckhoff Hall and the subsequent march around campus.

"What was good is that students of all colors came together, not just one group," said participant Mike De la Rocha, a third-year American Literature and Chicano Studies student.

The rally began with students holding up signs reproaching the U.S. government for its foreign policy and reciting statistics about the effects of U.S. sanctions in Iraq. They presented a skit of "Uncle Scam" selling "democracy," as well as weaponry, to foreign countries and dictatorships.

"The purpose of today is to educate; many students are not aware of what's going on," said USAC president Kandea Mosley.

Although the bombing of Iraq has been tentatively called off, protesters were more concerned with the U.N. sanctions on Iraq that have been in place since 1991. According to UNICEF, about 1 million children have died due to malnutrition as a direct effect of the sanctions. This translates to a child dying every 10 minutes.

"The reason why I'm here today is because I have a few problems with my government and with a child dying every 10 minutes," said speaker Tahua Hoke from the Muslim Students' Association.

As speakers continued on, one onlooker, second-year student Mike Gunter, yelled out "What do we do about it?"

"I don't like sanctions that kill kids ... but what do we do? If we lift the sanctions, we'll still have the corrupt government," he said later.

Few onlookers who gathered on Bruin Walk had comments about the rally. Most said they were uninformed on the issue. Among students who did take a stand, opinions were mixed.

"They shouldn't lift the sanctions because we need to stop Saddam Hussein," said first-year student Thomas Lew.

Speakers emphasized that the rally was by no means supporting Saddam Hussein or the Iraqi government.

"Saddam is sick and an enemy to humanity. But the sanctions have not helped since 1991, and they are an enemy to humanity as well," said Scott Kurishige of the Environmental Coalition.

The march stopped in front of Murphy Hall. "Chancellor Carnesale, where are you?" asked the protesters. "Carnesale has made a name for himself as an international diplomat. Where is our chancellor in this time of crisis?" said Kurishige.

Carnesale did not emerge from his office – if he indeed was there – and the rally moved on.

The next stop was Lu Valle Commons, where Mosley called on "all those students sitting there sipping Coca Cola" to take action.

Not all students supported the rally, and at least one was skeptical about the motives behind it.

"This is a big plot to get consistency votes. They never cared about the Middle East before," said Roce Ruttenberg, former USAC candi-

Campaign UCLA applies different techniques to raise $1.2 billion

FUND RAISING: Donor perks and telemarketing enable running of school

By Lawrence Ferchaw
Daily Bruin Contributor

UCLA's fund-raising process involves more than collecting registration fees – it also involves massive research, telemarketing and guaranteed tickets to Pauley Pavilion.

This fund-raising process is organized under the umbrella of Campaign UCLA, the seven-year program with the goal of raising $1.2 billion.

One cog in the fund-raising machine is the Annual Fund. This organization solicits parents of students, alumni and members of the community who have given before. Each year, telemarketers call back donors to ask them to renew their contribution.

Last year, the annual fund raised $5 million, and from July 1997 through the end of January, the fund has raised $3 million, with an average contribution of $160.

These contributions often pale in comparison to the high-profile gifts made by Michael Ovitz ($25 million) and most recently, Lew Wasserman ($10 million).

UC computers fall to mercy of hackers

A large volume of UC computers that run the Windows NT operating system crashed on Tuesday afternoon after computer hackers flooded campus networks with an Internet-based assault.

The crashes resulted in each computer having "the blue screen of death," the blue screen accompanying Microsoft Windows' "fatal error" message.

The computer attack, named "Teardrop," was part of a nationwide assault by hackers. Windows NT systems received an onslaught of worthless data, forcing the computer to devote an increasing amount of memory and processing power to the corrupt information leading to the machine crashing.

According to several Internet postings, several educational institutions were targeted in the attack, including UCLA, UC San Diego, Massachusetts Institute of Technology and University of Washington.

In a message to a UC Berkeley news group, university network administrator Ken Lindahl wrote that a "remote host" or hacker was intentionally attacking computers on the network. In response, Lindahl blocked the host's access to the network, which enabled the computers to recover from the attack.

Artwork of all cultures toasts Women's Day

Various speakers, artists and musical performers of international women celebrated International Women's Day on Thursday.

"There's always been the focus of women being oppressed," said Sanae Acid, program assistant at the International Student Center. "We really tried to create a positive celebration of being a woman in society."

The program included speaker Andrea Capachietti, a Humanitarian Aid Advisor. She spoke on remarkable women she met in refugee camps in Bosnia, showing a slide of a refugee Maria, an elderly woman in a bus.

"This woman hitched for two days to see the Pope," Capachietti said.

Capachietti's team picked up Maria and helped her travel to her destination. Capachietti said that refugees in Bosnia were housed in a building that was formerly a mental asylum. Instead of lamenting over their condition, women refugees gathered paint to create murals on the walls of the asylum.

To complement the theme of the symposium, artwork of women and created by women were propped against the walls of the room. Placed in the center of the room was an alter piece with goddess imagery. Other paintings were colorful depictions of nude women in oil painting.

The symposium was sponsored by the Dashew International Student Center, the Women's Resource Center, the Women's Studies program, the Center for the Study of Women, and the Academic Advancement Program.

Three Westwood cafes face health violations

Three Westwood restaurants were closed for health violations in the month of January.

As reported Wednesday in the L.A. Times, the Yum Yum Garden on Gayley Avenue was closed Jan. 6 and reopened Jan. 9 for vermin infestation, failure to prevent entrance and harboring of vermin, and lack of a potable water supply.

Noah's New York Bagels on Lindbrook Avenue was closed Jan. 7 and reopened Jan. 8 for tainted food and sewage-system failure.

The California Tea House, on Kinross Avenue was closed Jan. 29 and reopened Jan. 30 for contaminated food, and improper sanitizing and storage of multi-use utensils.

The L.A. County Department of Public Health is responsible for policing health codes and can shut down a restaurant when it considers it as posing a threat to public health.

As 84,000 markers line the ground of the L.A. National Cemetery, an obelisk commemorates the veterans.

THE SILENT AND THE DEAD

Since the Civil War, veterans have been laid to rest in the rolling lawns of the cemetery next door

By Michelle Navarro
Daily Bruin Staff

On one side of Veteran Avenue live 35,000 noisy and lively students. Across the street reside their 84,000 silent neighbors.

Every day, Bruins drive by on Sepulveda Boulevard or Veteran Avenue on their way to UCLA. But not many stop to look at what they are whipping past – rows and rows of tombstones, marking the men and women who put their lives on the line for the United States. They are the soldiers who fought in battles ranging from the Civil War to World War II.

Few passersby are conscious of the fathers, mothers, sons, daughters, and even dogs, who have been laid to rest since 1889 in the veterans' cemetery located next to the blue and gold microcosm. And this lack of recognition is reflected in the thousands of empty vases scattered along the hills.

Instead of roses, full dandelions eager for someone to come and blow their petals into the wind line the lawn. It is a peaceful, almost sad, hush that sits within the gated realm. Time is at a standstill there, since the assembly of white, stone markers, slightly gray with age, continues to wait for visitors to come and remember. To remember what the buried fought for.

"We still get thousands of people visiting the grave sites," said Lucy Devenney, the director of L.A. National Cemetery.

However, this number is small compared to other civilian cemeteries. And as time goes by, the last of the relatives of those interred will also pass on – leaving no one left to visit. What about the 35,000 students next door?

"A lot of students use Constitution Avenue (a street that runs through the burial ground) from Sepulveda to get to UCLA," offered Devenney.

That's all they do, drive by. If students could find the time to take a minute, they might learn about the other community they share Westwood with – the sleeping soldiers, with incredible pasts virtually unknown to this generation.

It all began on May 11, 1889, with the cemetery's first interment, Abner Prather, a member of the Fourth Indiana Infantry. From that point on, the hallowed grounds have continued to fill up with war veterans until 1960, when the cemetery was closed to further burials.

Now only second interments – close family of the soldiers already there – are allowed. A rose garden, where the ashes of veterans may be scattered, also is still open.

Peppered among the sea of graves are 14 recipients of the Congressional Medal of Honor, the highest military award given by Congress for bravery beyond the call of duty. The recipients were from either the Civil War, the Indian Wars, the Korean Campaign, the Boxer Rebellion or World War II.

Robert H. Von Schlick was the only one of the honorees who was killed in action. Although Von Schlick was wounded, he carried a fellow soldier to safety and returned to his command, which was partially exposed on a dike. When his command withdrew, Von Schlick remained there and kept up fire, making himself a visible target, until he was shot down by the enemy.

The soldier from World War II, Chris Carr, made a one-man attack that awarded him the prestigious medal.

When Carr's squad was under enemy fire from machine guns, pistols, rifles and mortars, he went ahead of his platoon to a location where he could see the enemy. Under incredible danger, Sergeant Carr captured five machine positions, killed eight Germans, took 22 prisoners, cleared the ridge for his company to advance, and dent-

Why

Give a round of applause to actors on silver screen

By Rachel Muñoz
Daily Bruin Staff

Have you ever been sitting in a movie theater watching the credits begin to roll when the audience erupts in applause? Maybe you laughed, or maybe you joined in.

Which leads to the question of why people clap in movie theaters. It's not like the actors are on the stage performing a live show. It's a screen with clips of acting that were recorded months ago.

Here is what a few students had to say about the subject:

"When you feel good you want to put something back. It is a show of appreciation. You are showing everyone else that they like the movie, but it kind of struck me as a little odd the first time I experienced it."

Danny Tappan
Second-year
Anthropology

"I have no idea. People have gotten used to clapping whenever they believe in something."

Kane Moon
Fifth-year
History

"It's to let other people know you like the movie. Not that I agree with it and not that I do it. I mean, you're clapping to a screen. It can't really respond. It's not like the movie makers can hear you."

Kim LaMagna
Fourth-year
English

"Because they are emotionally moved. People are in touch with the characters because they believe they are real. For example, with Darth Vader in 'Star Wars.' He is so cool."

Matt MacFarland
Fourth-year
Business/Economics

"I like it. Most people clap on opening night because that crowd is more interested in the movie. Otherwise they clap because they are really interested and want people to know. Maybe they like an actor."

Lorraine Lin
Anderson School employee and 1997 UCLA graduate

"It's is more comfortable than to sit in silence. You don't just really want to walk out. It's like a transitional stage; you're going from the movie frame of mind to normal life."

Mark Sanders
Third-year
Political science

MERCED

Those planning UC Merced are hoping to avoid a confrontation over money.

"We don't want to proceed with Merced unless the existing campuses have enough money to grow," Merritt said.

The infrastructure to support 5,000 students is expected to cost $400 million. Over $250 million of this will be necessary before the campus opens in 2005.

Much of the original funding for the campus is expected to come from the state, but the balance will come through statewide bond measures, said Mark Aydelotte, a UC spokesman in the Central Valley.

There is also hope that charity will help pay for infrastructure.

"Hopefully, half of the money for infrastructure will be donated, just like at UCLA," Aydelotte said.

A report from President Atkinson's office has outlined a three-step process for securing funding for UC Merced. The first is the passage of AB 1415, a state assembly bill that would stabilize funding for existing campuses. Secondly, approval of another $5 million state appropriation that would cover start-up costs for the new campus and thirdly, new bond measures to fund infrastructure.

But the UCs will not have to pay for the land on which UC Merced will be located.

The Virginia Smith Trust's sale of 2,000 acres to UC for the Merced campus at a price of only $10,000 has allowed plans for the campus to move forward. While searching for a campus site, the UCs required that the land price be nominal. The addition of a UC campus is expected to benefit the area as well.

"Do you know what that will do to land prices? They'll increase dramatically," said Aydelotte.

The Virginia Smith Trust owns thousands of acres in the Sierra foothills where they raise and sell cattle. Profits from this operation, as required by the trusts' bylaws, are donated to university-bound students in the form of scholarships and loans.

The trust will sell area surrounding the campus for related development, thus making more money and increasing its ability to help college-bound students, Aydelotte insisted.

UC Merced has been in the planning stages since 1988, although a 10th campus was suggested as early as the 1960s. Over 80 sites were originally investigated as to their viability for the 10th campus.

"The San Joaquin Valley is the only major California region of substantial population without a University of California campus," stated UC President Richard Atkinson in a letter sent last April.

A campus in the San Joaquin Valley is expected to raise the percentage of Central Valley high schoolers that go on to attend UCs. Currently the number is half the state average, Aydelotte said.

U.N. weapons inspectors head back to Baghdad

IRAQ: Presidential sites can now be checked by team after recent accord

By Eileen Alt Powell
The Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq – A 50-member team of U.N. weapons inspectors returned to Iraq on Thursday, led by an American whose presence helped touch off the Gulf crisis – a standoff they hope to verify is over.

Scott Ritter and his team arrived from Bahrain at the Habaniya military airport outside Baghdad and were driven to the United Nations headquarters in a van and a bus.

Ritter's team will "carry out inspections, including surprise inspections, to some of the sensitive sites," the official Iraqi News Agency said.

Sensitive sites are ministries and security facilities, which can be inspected only under special procedures in effect since June 1996.

Ritter's team had been prevented from entering some suspected weapons sites in January after Iraq alleged he was an American spy and that his team had a disproportionately high number of Americans.

Ritter left Iraq on Jan. 16, and chief inspector Richard Butler ordered him back in now, said Allen Dacey, the inspectors' spokesman in Baghdad.

In an unusual move, the government told television crews and photographers they cannot go into the U.N. headquarters to cover Ritter's arrival. One ministry official said Ritter "is not an important event."

His return follows the U.N.-Iraq accord of Feb. 23 under which Iraq agreed to give inspectors full access to eight presidential palaces that Baghdad previously declared off limits.

The accord was worked out by U.N. Chief Kofi Annan, who appointed a retired Indian diplomat on Thursday as his special representative to Iraq. Prakash Shah, 58, a former Indian ambassador to the United Nations, is part of an effort by Annan to expand contacts with the Iraqi leadership.

Palace inspections are not expected to start until the United Nations and the Iraqis agree on new rules for them. Those rules, the subject of intense discussions Thursday between U.N. and Iraqi officials in New York, have not yet been finalized. But diplomatic sources said a draft was delivered to Iraqi officials on Wednesday.

Ritter's team is only one of several that are deployed in Iraq. The other groups have worked daily, including through the crisis over the presidential sites.

INA said eight teams carried out inspections Thursday of seven sites already under surveillance. It is not known when Ritter and his team will start their work.

The 15-member U.N. Security Council has warned Iraq of the "severest consequences" if it reneges on the Feb. 23 accord. U.S. officials say the resolution gives the United States a green light to attack Iraq in such a case. But council members Russia, France and China insist the resolution does not authorize automatic military action.

Native Americans find tourism a big business

VACATIONS: Tribes head for German trade show to peddle traditional ways

By Jeff Barnard
The Associated Press

Since Columbus unleashed an onslaught of Europeans on North America 500 years ago, Indian tribes have been defeated in war, uprooted from their native lands, ravaged by disease and left in abject poverty.

This weekend, four American Indian tribes are headed to the world's biggest tourism trade show in Berlin in a reverse voyage of discovery to invite Europeans – especially Germans – to visit their reservations on vacation and leave behind some much-needed cash.

Oregon's Confederated Tribes of the Umatilla will be handing out posters of Cayuse Chief Sulump in a magnificent buffalo-horn headdress with the slogan "Nicht Ihr Durchschnittlicher Reisefuhrer."

That's German for "Not your average tour guide."

"With all the reservation economies who are trying to develop the flow of dollars from the outside ... we need to be thinking globally," said tribe spokeswoman Bobbie Conner.

Oregon's Umatilla and Warm Springs tribes will be joined at the International Tourism Exchange by representatives of the Eastern Band of Cherokees in North Carolina and the Blackfeet in Montana.

They are all scrambling to capitalize on an apparent German fascination with all things American Indian.

There are over 300 Indian clubs in Germany with an estimated 85,000 members. They dress up in native regalia, make themselves names and have weekend get-togethers. In 1994, there was a powwow in Essen that drew 6,000 of the 'Indianers.'

Germany's love affair with the American Indian goes back to the late 19th century, when Karl May, a teacher who had never been to America, wrote a series of adventure novels about Old Shatterhand and his Apache sidekick, Winnetou. They sold millions of copies and remain popular today.

In the '60s and '70s, a movie genre known as "Indianerfilme" grew up in East Germany where the Indians were the heroes, rather than the cowboys.

"There are few other peoples which have developed as much sympathy for Indians as the Germans," wrote German cultural historian Eckehard Koch.

The Cherokee were the first tribe to see the possibilities of selling Indian Country overseas, going to the international tourist trade show in 1991. With their 56,000-acre reservation next to Great Smokies National Park, the Cherokee have been in the tourism business since the '40s. The reservation features 450 tourist businesses, ranging from a casino to go-cart tracks. There are motels, campgrounds, and 30 miles of trout streams. Tourism brought in $70 million last year, exclusive of the casino, and employs 4,500 people.

First female space commander named

NASA: Lt. Col. Eileen Collins, already known as a pioneering shuttle pilot, breaks yet another barrier

By Robert Burns
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON – Breaking yet another sex barrier, veteran aerospace pilot Eileen Collins became the nation's first female space commander Thursday. "Dreams do come true," she said.

Collins, who already held the distinction of being the first female space-shuttle pilot, will command the Columbia on a mission, scheduled for December, to deploy an advanced telescope to peer into the deepest reaches of outer space.

It will be her third space-shuttle mission.

"When I was a child, I dreamed about space," Collins, a 41-year-old Air Force lieutenant colonel, said at a White House announcement ceremony. "I admired pilots, astronauts, and I've admired explorers of all kinds. It was only a dream of mine that I would someday be one of them."

In a switch from usual practice, the Collins promotion was announced by Hillary Rodham Clinton, as President Clinton and NASA administrator Daniel Goldin stood at her side.

"When her mission launches next December, the next generation of girls and boys will be able to look to the heavens and think, 'There's nothing I can't do,'" Clinton said.

"It's my hope that all children – boys and girls – will see this mission and be inspired to reach for their dreams, because dreams do come true," said Collins, a native of Elmira, N.Y.

New dinosaur species unearthed in Argentina

BUENOS AIRES, Argentina – An 85 million-year-old carnivorous dinosaur of an apparently unknown species has been discovered in southern Argentina, a paleontologist said Thursday.

Researchers found bones of herbivore Titanosaurus and of the unknown carnivore in the fossil-rich area of Rincon de los Sauces near the Andes, 760 miles southwest of Buenos Aires.

"There are fossils enough for Rincon de los Sauces to start its own museum," paleontologist Jorge Calvo of the University of Comahue told The Associated Press.

Calvo, a graduate of the University of Illinois at Chicago, heads the team that found the Titanosaurus, a fairly common dinosaur in the area, as well as the new carnivore.

"We found vertebrae, a shoulder blade and leg bones, all in excellent condition," Calvo said. "We've never seen pieces like these."

The 18-foot tall carnivore from the Upper Cretaceous period looked somewhat like Tyrannosaurus rex, found in North America.

The western Andean foothill provinces of Argentina are rich in fossil sites. Species unique to the region include the 90 million-year-old Unenlagia comahuensis, which researchers say could be the "missing link" to sustain the theory that modern birds descend from dinosaurs.

Government to warn hepatitis C victims

WASHINGTON – Hundreds of thousands of Americans who had blood transfusions years ago will receive letters warning they may have been infected with hepatitis C, a serious liver infection that often shows no symptoms for years.

The Department of Health and Human Services is preparing a campaign to encourage people to get tested for the virus, which was not identified until 1988. It can take 20 years for symptoms to surface.

There is no cure, but various treatments are in use and doctors are searching for improved therapies. About 1 million of an estimated 4 million infected Americans don't realize they have the sometimes fatal virus.

New research suggests hepatitis C patients are particularly vulnerable to liver failure, and the virus is the leading reason for liver transplants in the United States.

Intravenous drug users make up the vast majority of hepatitis C victims, but about 300,000 people may have contracted it from a blood transfusion before the first screening tests were created in 1990. It wasn't until mid-1992 that highly reliable tests were found.

The risk of infection through a blood transfusion today is very small thanks to improved screenings.

Florida begins using oral test for HIV virus

TALLAHASSEE, Fla. – Florida has begun using a lollipop-like device for oral testing to detect the HIV virus that causes AIDS, state health officials said Thursday.

Epitope Inc.'s OraSure analyzes cells scraped from a person's mouth. It is designed to reach people at high risk but who are missed by traditional testing programs that rely on needles to obtain blood samples.

"HIV testing with OraSure is safe and painless for both those being tested and those administering the test," said Florida Health Department Secretary James T. Howell. "The testing procedure takes about two minutes."

"Of the 65,000 to 100,000 people in Florida believed to be infected, two-thirds know of their infection," Howell said. "It is our goal to reach the remaining one-third."

date. "Every time elections come around, they always rally against some oppression to fool the UCLA community. I don't think they are educated enough on this subject."

Some students were more supportive, however.

"They have a valid point. It's really nice to see students take action," said fourth-year student Natasha Larmore.

Philosophy professor emeritus Donald Kalish, who has been at UCLA for almost 50 years, said he was pleased to see that "students are starting to be concerned with the global situation instead of just themselves and their 4.0s."

"U.S. policy against Iraq is completely incorrect. We have to do more than rattle our weapons," he added.

CAMPAIGN

"The goal for the annual fund is to increase the amount the Annual Fund takes in from $5 million to $10 million by the end of the campaign," said Annual Fund Director Tracie Christensen.

Last fiscal year, $231 million was raised by the entire campaign in 68,872 donations. Thirty-four of those gifts were over $1 million, representing about 35 percent of total gifts The average donation for the year was $3,365.

Donors to the campaign are often identified through some relationship with UCLA. This could include students, patients at the hospital, people who have used the library or those who support the athletic program.

Fund-raisers attempt to capitalize on these relationships, and a positive experience with the university is often the best selling point.

"We hope to build upon this relationship and develop it into a charitable donation," said Eicher.

Once these individuals are identified, fund-raisers make assumptions. Based upon what the fund-raisers know about the individual, they determine how much that person can give. With a group of potential donors, fund-raisers can set a goal on how much they can raise using these same assumptions.

This is where research comes in. The campaign does research on individuals to determine their capability to donate. All this information is public, and includes rankings of businesses and their owners that give fund-raisers an idea of the donors' financial standing. Knowing the people's occupations or the areas where they live can help the fund-raisers determine their ability to donate to the campaign.

Once a person donates, the fund-raisers can make further assumptions about how people in similar positions will respond to fund-raising attempts.

Fund raising does have a cost because of the many employees involved in solicitation and research.

"Our goal is to keep the cost of a contribution to 10.8 cents per dollar of donation," said Eicher.

The Annual Fund, for example, has a staff of 100 student telemarketers and 24 professional staff members who supervise and run direct mail activities, according to Christensen. This pushes their cost per donation to 40 to 45 cents per dollar.

Donors are not always just giving out of generosity, though.

"We can offer something in return to recognize their donation," said Eicher.

This recognition can take the form of buildings, scholarships or endowed chairs named in honor of the donor.

To recognize donors to the Annual Fund, a special category – known as the Chancellor's Associates – exists for donors who give in excess of $1,500 per year. These individuals get special recognition along with some benefits.

One benefit is the opportunity to purchase priority seating at football and basketball games. The priority is assigned based upon the level of the donation and is similar to the benefit offered to those who donate to the athletic department, said Christensen.

Once money is collected, it can go to any number of places. Money donated to the Annual Fund is unrestricted and goes to the UCLA Foundation. The board of directors and the chancellor then determine priorities and where the money should go.

"Much of the money goes to support programs and projects that the chancellor can't find other sources for," said Christensen.

Money not donated to the Annual Fund, which includes many of the large gifts, is most often given with restrictions that the money goes to a certain area, like the medical center or for an endowed chair.

This outside funding has become crucial in recent years as state funding as a percentage of the budget has steadily decreased.

"Support from the private sector has become absolutely critical to the university's future," said Chancellor Albert Carnesale.

CEMETERY

ed the enemy line enough for the battalion to take over commanding ground.

One of the dogs buried at L.A. National, Blackout, received full military honors at his ceremony. The war dog was wounded during World War II.

There are countless stories that could be told – if only the dead could speak. But although their voices are silenced, a feeling of history and importance emanates from the place.

"I have spent some time in the veterans' cemetery," said Michael Chandler, an administrative assistant for UCLA's Orientation Program. "It's a pretty awesome sight to stand on the hill and look out over the sea of white stones, marking the final resting places of those who not only had to fight, but live on afterwards, with the victory of death."

The various monuments contribute to the sense of honor surrounding the graves. One in the southeast corner carries the inscription: "To those who volunteered and extended the hand of liberty to alien peoples, 1902." This particular structure was donated by the Spanish-American War Veterans.

In the center of the burial ground is the indoor columbarium, the only one in the National Cemetery System, a matching pergola and a rostrum.

The columbarium has over 5,000 niches for cremated remains. Inside, two small hallways reveal the thousands of name plaques, a few of which hold a flower in their metal vases. In the center, several uniforms and pictures on display personalize the Spanish-style structure.

The rostrum (like a podium) is the site for the annual Memorial Day Service, when Devenney said they get their largest visitation.

"The Scouts come on the Saturday before and put an American Flag on every grave," Devenney said, "It takes those kids about an hour and a half to do it. It's really great."

On that one day, the crowds gather to remember. But it can get pretty lonely during the other 364 days of the year.

An inscription on a marker outside the administrative office explains why they are worthy of a few minutes of time.

"Your own proud land's heroic soul, must be your filler grave; she claims from war his richest spoil, the ashes of the brave."

VIEWPOINT

Think before you bash The Bruin

READERS: Big downfall of paper comes from lack of student involvement

Michael Daugherty

In tribute to the media theme of today's Viewpoint section, the topic of this column was going to be "Why The Daily Bruin Sucks." I had accumulated an embarrassment of anecdotes and clippings (not to mention my own experiences), in support of my thesis to that effect. But then I had a change of heart. I still intend to tell you what's wrong with The Bruin. But first, some background.

It started more or less the first time I ever picked up a Bruin. The headline article was shockingly idiotic. On a whole, the paper was so poorly written, so absent of any coherent point or direction, so slanted, so full of logical, typographical, punctuation and spelling errors, that I felt compelled to check the masthead to see whether or not the Daily Bruin bothered to employ editors. Upon seeing that there was indeed an editorial staff, I was left to assume that they were all hooked on crack.

A few days later, I found another article goofy beyond the threshold of human tolerance. Then, another. And another. The Bruin became in my eyes little more than a source of comic-tragic relief. But, after a few quarters it stopped being funny. It started to be an embarrassment. It made me angry.

One day, while reading a particularly inscrutable piece I finally, and loudly, snapped: "The Bruin sucks! Look at this crap. This isn't a newspaper, it's a free-for-all!" The man driving the Campus Express upon which I was traveling at that moment took umbrage to my unseemly outburst. (Timing has never been my strong suit.) I was summarily ejected and had to cover the remaining 50 yards to Ackerman on foot. On an impulse, I made my way straight to The Bruin's offices. I expected it would resemble an opium den, black-lights, Grateful Dead music and a bunch of glassy-eyed, pot-heads bitching at each other because somebody spilled bong water all over the hard-drive that held the following day's edition.

I was wrong. It was orderly. The lights were on. There were computers and telephones. People were busy doing stuff. Anyway, one thing lead to another; thirty thousand words later you are reading what is my fifteenth and penultimate column for Viewpoint.

I hate to say this but the Bruin still does – at times – suck. But it sucks for reasons other than I had originally assumed. It's not for lack of trying, not for lack of resources, and not for lack of talent. I will tell you why the Bruin – at times – sucks: because you suck.

Let me qualify that. I didn't mean you personally. I meant everyone but you. Everyone-but-you sucks because The Bruin is regularly vilified for not having a more diverse staff. Yet, out of a student population of thirty-five thousand, only forty people applied to be Viewpoint columnists last quarter.

Everyone-but-you sucks because they are so deeply couched in their beliefs that they seemingly disappear between their own cushions. They go into apoplectic fits of indignation when The Bruin prints anything that doesn't toe their ideological line.

Everyone-but-you sucks because to them The Bruin is nothing more than a forty-page holder for the world's easiest ESL crossword puzzle.

Everyone-but-you sucks because they can't stop bitching about The Bruin but also can't stop to do anything meaningful about it. Now, everyone-but-you might be thinking "That's easy for you to say, Mr. Big Dictionary, but I can't write, I can barely think, and I sure as hell don't have any spare time for sharing my opinion." To them I respond: Of course you do, and who said anything about knowing how to write? Just read Viewpoint, and you'll realize that the ability to form a complete sentence is hardly.

Last week alone, The Bruin ran dozens of articles covering a multitude of topics, including: affirmative action, class web sites, snow boarding, sports, religion, Iraq, Black history, gay fraternities, ASUCLA and salad. Now, guess how many printable responses from readers the Bruin received last week. A hundred? Fifty? Twenty? Wrong. The correct answer is eight. Thirty-five thousand students + hundreds of column inches of text = eight stinkin' responses. I rest my case.

As I mentioned above, I initially set out to write a scathing little exposé here; but, something strange happened. It was Tuesday. I was at The Bruin's offices when I saw a staff member sitting cross-legged on the floor in the middle of a huge pile of what must have been hundreds of past editions of The Bruin.

I looked at the pile and saw it for what it was: thousands of pages, millions of words and more. God only knows how many hours of work, how many interviews, telephone calls, rolls of film, meetings, keystrokes and deadlines were in there. And what about the coffee, the frayed nerves, the pressure and – no doubt – the tears? It was all in that pile.

Later, around two o'clock in the morning, as I sat at my desk in the wash of monitor glow and watched a cold, steady breeze billow my curtains into shapes of ghostly figures, it occurred to me that determining the sum of brain hours, devotion and passion that went into creating that pile of Bruins would exceed by a long shot any computational skill I could ever hope to possess. I remembered what it was like the first time I saw my own thoughts on someone else's paper. I remembered the first hate mail I ever received. ("Who the hell do you think you are ...") And somewhere in the

The Forum

TODAY: This week's forum explores the mass media and the coverage it provides to the public. What is the media responsible for doing and has it succeeded? Has the media become too sensationalistic? Viewpoint examines whether the media responds to the public's interests or whether the media simply attempts to arouse the public with trivial stories that are geared toward entertaining, not informing.

Manipulating Media

Poor coverage of vital issues leaves public uninformed

By Dave Middleton

There have been various studies conducted lately, including one recently published in The Daily Bruin, which point to the fact that political apathy among college students is at unprecedented heights. When we are compared with other industrial countries it becomes apparent how pathetically uninformed the American public really is. It is this very lack of education that allows us to feel distanced from politics today. I believe that the media's failure to educate the American public is the primary reason for this rise of political disenchantment. We, as citizens, pay a high cost for our lack of knowledge. Because if Americans are not educated about issues of importance we forfeit any control or influence we may have on the world around us.

In our fast-paced society our primary way to learn about world and local events is through the media. We can only educate ourselves to a point. Therefore, it is the media's duty to help us become politically and socially educated. It is obvious that we are reliant on the media's assistance, which is becoming less available and less effective. Instead of enlightening us, the media seems content to merely amuse us.

It is far too simple to see that the media focuses on some issues while ignoring others. In this way the media fails us. Simply look at Los Angeles network news. What the hell are we watching? Television news is far more bent on entertaining its viewers than educating them. We are not provided with an accurate portrayal of the important events of the day. We are instead fed a highlights reel of car crashes, explosions, disasters and other eye candy. We don't know what is going on in the world around us because of the media's focus on largely irrelevant issues. We don't hear about anything of importance unless it has entertainment value. Henceforth, everyone's eyes are glued to the television news watching the latest car-chase footage. The only people who benefit from this are those who get to advertise their "Best Police Chases" video during the commercial break. I'll be the first to admit that this footage is pretty entertaining. But, we may as well be watching cartoons because this coverage provides us with little substance. Television news provides us with virtually no information, which would enable us to become better citizens.

Scandals have now become the media's focus. Don't even get me started talking about the Clinton-Monica Lewinsky coverage. The depiction of "Zippergate" has been nothing short of a daytime soap opera. The media seems to have an undying thirst to find out every detail about the private lives of our politicians to an extraordinary extent. We hear more about the president's sexual escapades than we do about his policy decisions. By focusing on these issues what type of public discourse is the media encouraging? How is a parent supposed to respond to junior, who after hearing a local news broadcast, asks, "Mommy, mommy. What's oral sex mean?" The media even has the power to set the discourse of our children.

The Daily Bruin itself, although clearly less sensationalistic than many other papers, is at times as guilty as the rest of the media for its lack of prioritization and focus on important issues. Is it appropriate to do a front-page story about an individual who claims to have known and spoken with Monica Lewinsky, even if he is in the UCLA community? Just in case the media hadn't already dragged her private life through the mud enough, in this article, the readers were provided with more insight into Monica's character. Especially enlightening were Monica's supposed comments about her relationship with Clinton. In her words, Clinton and herself were "Fuck buddies." This was important news that we Bruins needed to know.

When we examine what material the media focuses on it is also important that we consider what coverage they are failing to provide us with. Television news failed to provide us with an adequate understanding of the recent crisis in the Persian Gulf. Most of us don't understand the international implications of a war with Iraq. We weren't given an adequate account of the many complexities that have led to this standoff. Instead of better informing us the media would rather present us with the American people's opinion of whether or not we should go to war. The American public on the whole is as poorly informed as you and I. Therefore, should we base our opinions on theirs?

Further, it is important to understand that the media's lack of focus on key issues causes political disenchantment. News must fit within certain spatial and temporal confines. Most television news broadcasts last for either a half-hour or a full hour unless a breaking scandal cuts into your favorite programming. Simply put, when the media focuses on issues such as the O.J. Simpson trial, the tragic death of Princess Di, the abuse of Pamela Lee, Eddie Murphy's late night joy-rides, Monica Lewinsky's Oral Office duties, Lorena Bobbit's cutlery skills or Tanya Harding's competitive edge, there just isn't enough time or room for discussion about issues which are essential to improve our nations civic knowledge. By its coverage of largely irrelevant stories and its ignoring of other issues, the media sadly influences what people view as important news.

These modern media trends lead to a public with little control over their government. Our attention diverted by unimportant issues, we cannot contribute to our country's political process. This allows our elected officials to make decisions without consulting the public, hence, undermining democracy. When the power to make decisions rests in the hands of select government officials rather than in the hands of the American public we have forfeited the very rights which we have fought to protect.

TV news tries to lure larger audience with sensationalistic story

CHOICE: Viewers have power to protest plethora of shows like 'When Animals Attack! Part 4'

By Paolo Bayless

If the average Bruin tried to discern the role of the media by turning on the TV, he would come to the inevitable conclusion that its chief role is to provide non-stop coverage of the daily LAPD high-speed chase. Seriously. There definitely appears to be a clear trend in which the media is increasingly filled with accounts of mayhem.

This trend seems to be a result of the growing awareness by corporate America of sensational media's profitability. To maximize their audience, the media seems to be relying more than ever on a rather interesting mixture of hype, melodrama and sensationalism.

Nowhere is this sensationalism more apparent than in local TV news. Every story seems to be dubbed "unbelievable," "grizzly" or "shocking". This dialogue would seem more appropriate on a carnival midway, but it has become necessary to entice today's violence-numb viewers.

I don't believe there is anything drastically wrong with this sort of melodramatic commentary and content. I equate this with any other sort of company trying to sell me something. I don't actually believe Colgate when they tell me that their new toothbrush is "revolutionary," but if it's half price with my grocery store card, then I might get it.

Let's be honest. We have only ourselves to blame. In a society where "When Stunts Go Wrong" is such a ratings bonanza that they have to make a sequel, how can we blame the media? I'll be the first to admit that every time one of these high speed chases takes place, I'm the one who is jumping up and down yelling, "Shoot out the tires!" in front of the TV.

On the other hand, what is truly dangerous and must be controlled is when the media takes it upon itself to create the news. Recent examples of this are the Dateline program in which a vehicle was rigged to explode and the premature condemnation of Richard Jewel in the Olympic Park bombing.

With this in mind, we cannot just ignore the activity of the media, deeming its impact inconsequential. If you doubt me, remember the fate of former President Nixon, with an emphasis on "former."

The good news in all of this is that the media marketplace remains a "buyer's market." The fact that such an overwhelming number of news channels, periodicals and countless other media outlets exists means that these companies are highly responsive to their customer's preferences.

Therefore, the role of the media is really in the hands of the public. It is you who can choose what you want to see, hear and read, and the manner in which you prefer it to be presented. I can only humbly request of you to keep the police chase coverage enact; it is a nice substitute for HBO.

backwater recesses of my mind a little neuron labeled "Daily Bruin" switched all by itself from "criticism" to "appreciation." I was instantly humbled. The Bruin rules.

That's not to say that The Bruin doesn't need to be better. Anyone who works there will gladly acknowledge its rough edges. In the words of one staffer: "A lot of people I know feel The Bruin is not what they consider 'quality.' Either we don't research enough, we don't cover enough or whatever. But, what they don't realize is that we're students too ... I know it sounds like an excuse, but it's true. Ya, we can try harder, but at least give us a break."

Everyone wants The Bruin to be the best that it can be. So as I prepare to leave this school, I'd like to respectfully offer a short list of real, practical things we can do to make it a better paper. (By the by: I will employ here the same convention as that used in one of the more recent features added to Viewpoint – I refer here to "Thumbs Up/Thumbs Down" wherein members of The Bruin's editorial board voice their approval or disdain for various and sundry news items by means of a Sisklean and Ebertian thumb-pointing convention.)

Thumbs Down to "Thumbs Up/Thumbs Down." As you know, the editors compile a list of news items, put on arbiter's beanies, and vote. You are not privy to the outcome of the vote (six to one? three to four?); all you know is that the item in question has been relegated to being one of two things: good or bad. I suppose I wouldn't mind as much if the topics at hand didn't warrant a shred more scrutiny than they end up getting. I could live with "Thumbs down to serial murderers" or "Thumbs up to lovely weather." But, regrettably, the "Thumbs" items usually aren't all that easy to nail. The problem with "Thumbs" heavily condensed and surprisingly biased blurbs is that they deprive the reader of any opportunity to consider both sides of the issue and, consequently, form a thoughtful, well-based opinion.

I am delighted to provide the following example: The Bruin's editorial board gave a "Thumbs Down" to a proposed law that would give judges the option of revoking the financial aid packages of convicted drug dealers. The blurb was decent enough to point out that selling drugs was "the wrong way to make money." Frankly, I found the editorial board's position on this matter so astonishing that I had to wonder if some of its members didn't have a personal stake in the issue. I disagree with their position whole-heartedly. But what really bothers me is that some very real components of the issue were never mentioned. For instance, wouldn't someone convicted of selling drugs be indisposed to attending classes from his or her jail cell? Next, why would someone involved in the lucrative enterprise of selling narcotics need financial aid in the first place? Finally (and more to the point), wouldn't that revoked financial aid package be re-awarded to someone a bit more deserving – someone perhaps who wasn't engaged in the act of poisoning people's minds and bodies for profit? Has the concept of merit evaporated?

I think our readership would be better served if both sides of the argument were aired. A more interesting approach would be to post the issue du jour accompanied by opposing arguments á la 60 Minutes' "Point-Counterpoint." That would be neat.

Thumbs Down to horrifying headline errors. We can't expect the copy editors to catch every single mistake. Even the big boys and girls at papers like the L.A. Times commit an occasional boner. Last Thursday's front page headline comes to mind: "Carnesale looking for a No. 2 man" (Should we assume that women need not apply?). With all the gender discrimination articles this paper rightly runs, you'd think we'd be more attentive. I probably wouldn't make such a big deal of it if it had been buried on page eight. It wasn't though. It was the front page, above the fold headline. Ouch. In fairness, I should say that for every typo or mangled sentence, or sexist faux pas you read, a hundred have been caught and corrected. That notwithstanding, someone, somehow needs to get a handle on these especially embarrassing mistakes.

Finally: Thumbs Down to The Daily Bruin's policy against printing editorial responses to reader's letters. This is bad. I am reminded of the most intentionally funny thing I have ever read in this paper: Justin Horey's hilarious and cheeky mock-interview with our new chancellor. Some foaming-at-the-mouth genius wrote in the next day incensed by Justin's effrontery. It seems he thought the interview was real. The writer's vitriolic response was hilarious if you had read the column, but made Justin look like a cretin if you hadn't. The Bruin's readership would have been better served if Justin or the editors had responded: "Hey, Mister, no offense. It's called satire."

On this issue, one current member of The Bruin's news staff put it nicely: "Some people miss the point so badly that you want to let them know, but you can't. They get to have the last word and unfortunately that's the aftertaste that everyone else who reads it will have." Other local throwaways (for example, "L.A. Weekly" and "New Times") print responses and they are, to me, often the most interesting part of the paper. For the sake of The Bruin's credibility as well as the reader's benefit, this policy needs to be reconsidered.

So there it is, my two cents worth. If you think any of my notions warrant further action, feel free to let The Bruin know. In closing, I would like to add one last point: I had no idea how much effort goes into putting out just one edition of this paper. With what little I do now know of the task, I can only describe it as Sisyphean. That's not to say that The Bruin doesn't commit some godawful mistakes all too frequently. And, that's not to say that The Bruin doesn't deserve meaningful criticism. But I think The Bruin also deserves far more credit than it ever gets.

The people who read The Bruin have expectations. So do the people who work at The Bruin. When those expectations are not met, we all suffer to some degree. I don't know what psychic mechanism is involved in the willing act of putting your name on something that will get duplicated twenty thousand times and held up to the scrutiny of friends and strangers alike. I suppose it varies from person to person. But I have to wonder how everyone-but-you would like to see their most recent homework assignment or paper exposed for mass consumption. How deep a hole can you dig?

Holding The Bruin up to ridicule is easy. Sometimes it's even fun. So I suppose it should come as no surprise that so many readers (whose days are often filled with activities that are not easy and not fun) find some comfort in taking a poke at the Bruin. Fair enough. But keep in mind, The Bruin puts out more words in one day than the average undergrad will put out in an entire quarter. When everyone-but-you (myself included) considers how much green ink they might expect to find slathered all over a quarter's worth of their own output, The Bruin starts to look a whole lot better.

The three Divas

The musical trio that calls itself Global Divas takes listeners from Zimbabwe to Peru

International Music Network

Musician Susana Baca brings her Afro-Peruvian background to "Global Divas."

By Jammie Salagubang
Daily Bruin Contributor

Been around the world lately?

On Sunday in the Veterans Wadsworth Theater, the Global Divas will attempt to give audiences an international music experience.

Susana Baca, Stella Chiweshe and Tish Hinojosa comprise the first group of women to perform under this title.

"They cross boundaries – it's really an interesting combination of these three women representing world-music styles that fit together yet are very different," says Michael Blachly, director of the UCLA Center for Performing Arts. "It's international folkloric music, and really it's celebrating the diverse contributions of female musicians."

One of the highlights of this tour is Stella Chiweshe's music from Zimbabwe. Though her music is from an exotic locale, Chiweshe says it has a universal appeal.

"It heals, it soothes, it's very relaxing," Chiweshe says. "It is also music that makes it possible for people to get in touch with themselves, in touch with the universe."

An important part of Chiweshe's music is the mbira dza vadzmu, a 22-pronged, metal, hand piano.

However, if just pronouncing the name sounds difficult, learning to play it was even more so for Chiweshe because of her gender.

"When I (first) heard this mbira, I wanted to keep hearing it," Chiweshe says. "But everybody – women and men, girls and boys – looked at me as though I had lost my mind for wanting to play it."

The male attitude in Zimbabwe is so biased against female mbira players that she says men don't even want to marry a woman who know how to play.

"Once the men had put down their rules, they were hard to move," Chiweshe relates. "But this wasn't a rule from my ancestors, but a rule from the living, and that's why I pushed myself and really fought against it."

Listening to spirits also plays an important part in inspiring Chiweshe. She says some people even refer to her as "Priestess."

"I'm not just playing for the world, I'm praying for the world," she explains. "(When I play) I'm much more connected to spirits than to people. I'm very connected to nature."

Baca takes the audience on a trip to Peru with the nature of her Afro-Peruvian music.

"It's very rhythmic music because of its African roots, but at the same time, because of the Andean influence, you get a very melancholy feel," Baca says.

Baca herself is a camba (a person of mixed native Peruvian and African ancestry) and says she was born into the music. She remembers her mother putting her to bed before parties as a child but never going to sleep because she stayed up to listen to the music.

"I loved the music before anything else," Baca says. "It was a part of me from the very beginning."

Like Chiweshe, Baca uses native instruments to help her achieve her unique sound. One of the principle instruments she uses is the cajon, a wooden box that roughly equals the role of drums in American music. She also uses a quijada de burro, an actual donkey's jaw which produces a buzzing sound.

"(It) even has rattling teeth," Baca laughs.

Baca's difficulty comes not from learning

Folks drawn to Cartoonsville for fun, not food

RESTAURANT: Nostalgic childhood atmosphere can be bought at a price

By Terry Tang
Daily Bruin Contributor

Within every adult there lies an inner child who longs to play video games, guzzle root-beer floats and watch Saturday morning cartoons.

In the kingdom of Cartoonsville, people of all ages revisit childhood by eating and drinking against a wonderland backdrop. However, a journey there should only be made during rare occasions because the somewhat high prices would put even Richie Rich off guard.

Located in Brentwood on the corner of Wilshire and Bundy, Cartoonsville Eaterie & Funhouse is a short drive from the UCLA campus, but far enough away from the all-too-familiar sights and sounds of Westwood. Although far from the ideal date place, Cartoonsville caters well to big groups and families.

At first, college students may feel out of place, but within a group, relaxing and acting silly can come easily. Inhibition is hard to maintain since hyper little boys and girls constantly swarm the dining area; with music ranging from the Spice Girls to "The Sound of Music," having a serious conversation proves difficult.

Tailor-made for children, each table is covered in a red, purple or green vinyl tablecloth. Even the wooden, upright chairs sport happy faces. Vintage lunch boxes from the days of He-Man and Care Bears, up to the time of Jurassic Park, adorn the walls and put older customers in a nostalgic mood.

Since many of the diners are kids, the waiters are patient and make sure the patrons know their names. However, a meal may get interrupted by the shrill of a whistle. The high-pitched sound signals that it is time for the waiters to break into a chorus of "Happy Birthday" and make the lucky guest feel like a king for a day.

One unique service the eatery offers is a versatile balloon artist. Walking from table to table, the balloon man carries a wide variety of colors and inflatable designs.

ERNEST LEE/Daily Bruin

To go along with the carnival-like ambience, the adult menu consists mostly of popular kiddie cuisine and incorporates Southwestern flavors.

The meal starts off with a complimentary dish of raw carrots, celery and dip. Customers can choose appetizers such as crispy chicken tenders or nachos with spinach artichoke dip ($4.95 to $6.95). Skip the conventional snack of onion rings ($4.95). Although they give a sizable portion of at least two dozen rings, the onions are not coated with enough batter and lack the crunchy texture characteristic of this snack.

Entrees range from pizza and hamburgers to baby-back ribs and come with the typical choices of salad or vegetables, and baked potato or rice pilaf ($8.95 to $18.50). The salads contain a sparse selection of ingredients – lettuce, spinach leaves and onions – and could use more fresh vegetables. Also, the grilled chicken breast is succulent and has a smoky taste but is a little salty ($11.95). As a result, the potato or rice dish is a must. Although the chicken and rice mesh well together, the portions do not measure up to the price.

After the meal, guests can select from an array of sweets, spanning from a double-chocolate cake to a giant banana split ($1.85 to $4.99). The angel-food cake topped with strawberries is not as sweet as it sounds ($4.99). Although the cake has a spongy texture, it only tastes sweet when dipped in the strawberry syrup. However, it will still make a satisfying dessert for a customer who does not crave more sugary items like an ice-cream sundae or a milk shake.

Another confection to try is the strawberry cheesecake ($4.99). Even with its smooth texture, the cheesecake is light enough not to bog down the stomach. Guests may prefer to share the pricey desserts since the cake rations are again a little meager, considering the cost.

Cartoonsville does not fit the mold or the budget of a college joint. Although a younger sibling would be more at home in Cartoonsville, college students may want to give the restaurant a try if they can keep in mind that age is just a number.

"Men With Guns"
Directed by John Sayles
Starring Federico Luppi, Damian Delgado and Tania Cruz

Director John Sayles' talent has been exposing the tender interior of human tragedy. His name functions as a sort of brand name for empathy; he is able to communicate some of the most bewildering and incomprehensible experiences to those who haven't experienced them.

"Men With Guns" attempts to communicate the truth of an overwhelming, 20th-century saga: the decades of oppression and violence in Latin America. It is such a huge topic to penetrate – so many thousands murdered, such a mind-numbing constant of violence and terror – that he loses himself trying to explain it all.

The story centers around a wealthy doctor from a city in an unnamed Latin-American nation, whose travels into the mountains expose him to life in the Indian villages. It follows the archetype of the voyage: these characters act as transmitters for the brutal music of life in contemporary rural Latin America.

Sayles succeeds in showing the types that populate this landscape. We meet an orphan, a defrocked priest, a mute woman, a tortured soldier. But because the characters are symbolic, they lose their humanity, and thus, their affective power. The one exception is a remarkably sensitive and ambiguous performance by Damian Delgado as a conscience-stricken soldier.

Just that Sayles tried to explore and communicate the experience of being poor, Indian and facing constant political violence is a feat in itself. And as the "men with guns" make recurrent appearances throughout the film, we come to realize at least one aspect of that experience: the powerlessness.

"The Leading Man"
Directed by John Duigan
Starring Thandie Newton and Jon Bon Jovi

Though Felix Webb (Lambert Wilson) is "England's greatest living playwright," he's created a pretty shoddy character for his own personal stage. He's one of those spineless worms who's small enough to find room between a rock and a hard place: his passion for his lead actress Hilary (Thandie Newton) against his moral responsibility to his unhappy wife (Anna Galiena, who conjures sorcery with every smile). He's been stringing everyone along so far, that is until Hilary finally gives him the "her or me" bit.

One would think that the time has come for Felix to act. But the bookworm is no act-er, and so he hires Robin Grange (Jon Bon Jovi), a shady American-screen heartthrob and the leading man in Felix's play, to seduce his lonely wife so that she can build enough self-esteem to discover a life independent of Felix. Of course, there are some unexpected glitches in their plot as the title of the movie takes on a few different meanings.

Duigan is one of the best Australian directors working today, and a lot of the moments in "The Leading Man" derive from the very best of his know-how. His romantic comedies, especially "Sirens," have a charming way of fondling human sensuality to slap some fun at the puritanical paradigms which engender society's sewing circles of stuffy hypocrites. That's not quite Duigan's intention this time around (Felix is the only "stuffy" person we see), but we can still sense his familiar film-making giddiness which evokes honest smiles.

But giddiness can only go so far, and one noticeable paradox about Duigan is that his style seems so mature when he deals with adolescent characters and so adolescent when he deals with his mature characters. One reason is that adults are simply not as cheerfully cute as teenagers are when they're in love, and so Duigan's playfulness, at times, becomes a mismatch: what passes for endearing quirkiness in "Flirting" becomes corny hokum in "The Leading Man" (and the film's ending is shamelessly so). And much of the carefree poetry of Duigan's language is absent in this film, but we can mostly attribute that to Virginia Duigan (his sister) who wrote the script.

Still, it's nice to see Duigan back again, blowing some light air into that heavy smog of sexual seriousness that's in movie theaters right now.

"U.S. Marshals"
Directed by Stuart Baird
Starring Tommy Lee Jones and Wesley Snipes

Intrinsic in a chase movie is the idea that eventually the chase must end, making a sequel nearly impossible. This is perhaps the most overriding flaw with the "Fugitive's" follow-up, "U.S. Marshals," which is pretty much a pointless exercise.

"U.S. Marshals" reverses the protagonist and antagonist of "The Fugitive," making Jones and his band of deputy marshals the heroes, pitting them against another fugitive, Mark Roberts (Wesley Snipes), a former government agent who knows exactly how to outwit his pursuers.

Snipes had the uneasy task of filling the void left by Harrison Ford. He does an adequate job of making incredible near-escapes believable, but the source material here is thin. His character is a plot device; he is neither

"Bring in Da Noise, Bring in Da Funk" brings together history, hip hop in a foot-stomping cadence

"Bring in Da Noise, Bring in Da Funk" brings together history, hip hop in a foot-stomping cadence

Loose clothes flying, flat shoes flapping, this is sweat and work and style.

A Mississippi moan, a Harlem hum, this is poetry screamed across a shadowed stage.

Drumming, spinning, louder – louder – saying it for those who couldn't. Pausing. Then louder, faster, dancing it till it's a plantation and a smoky night club and a scratchy record. This is da Beat.

And Derick K. Grant provides the feet of the beat, taking over for 25-year-old tap guru Savion Glover in the national tour of "Bring in Da Noise, Bring in Da Funk," now in previews at the Ahmanson Theatre. As the show's lead dancer, Grant assumes responsibility for conveying more than a century of African American history with the squares of metal on his shoes.

His character is both ghostly and earthy, slipping through the years as slave ships sail into the harbor and, much later, a taxi rumbles by, snubbing him and three other African American men. Because, as the show stabbingly ponders, as long as there has been the beat, there has been oppression.

"My character is like the part in all of us who has just constantly been challenged," Grant says. "Struggling, being chained – whether it's physically through slavery or mentally, working in industry ... It's just what the beat is, you know, the part in all of us that wants to rise above."

It is perhaps this blend of universality and nuance that garnered the musical

Riverdance, Tap Dogs, STOMP blend styles in a return to the roots of tap-dance culture

It has been raining off and on all afternoon outside the Valley's Mort-Lindy Studio. But a little water never stopped Gene Kelly from singing and dancing, and this group of longtime tap dancers is equally undeterred by what nature, culture and the [illegible] throw at them.

Finally, she clicks out a short routine.

Noise, Bring in Da Funk" slides into town, there's no denying that tap today is big and loud.

What [illegible] es to such global talent may not realize is that, as home to this roving impromptu session and the prestigious Jazz Tap Ensemble, Los Angeles holds its own as a tap center. Today, in fact, veteran tapper Sam Weber has flown down from San Francisco for the three-hour jam, accompanied by a student visiting from Germany.

present it in a highly commercialized form, like "Lord of the Dance," which is essentially a rock concert with taps," Weber says. "And those dancers are certainly highly skilled, but I'm not sure their audiences are responding to their skill or just to the whole ambiance of the scene. It's the same thing with Tap Dogs. Those dancers are not particularly skilled, and I don't think audiences know the difference."

four Tony Awards in 1994, tying it with "Rent," the youth-driven, fight-the-system production down the street.

"They kind of grew up together. They're like two kids who went to school together," Grant says, explaining the initial comparisons in the press. Appropriately, "Noise/Funk" follows "Rent's" four-month run at the Ahmanson. "Their story is one of people who don't have much, and they're trying to make it. And that's what we're saying. The fact that you can have two shows with that same kind of message out there and people appreciating that (is) tremendous."

What the characters in "Noise/Funk" don't have ranges from freedom to money to creative control. The latter emerges in allusions of biting satire to the '30s and '40s film performances of tap legends Bill "Bojangles" Robinson and the Nicholas brothers. As the brothers, dubbed "Grin and Flash," perform their trademark move, leap-frogging over one another and landing in the splits, they chant, "Slick your kitchen/greasy shine ... no dough, no show."

These portrayals have drawn criticism from fans who argue that the show accuses them of selling out and ignores their genuine artistry.

Grant, however, acknowledges, "If it wasn't for them I wouldn't be here," and sees the caricatures as a jab at Hollywood politics rather than the individual dancers.

"(The film industry) did things like making these fabulous tap dancers who were so rhythmically inclined start smiling and doing this jigaboo shit that had nothing to do with the dance itself," Grant says. "So that's really what we try to point the finger at."

Cast member Miles Jeffries acknowledges, "It's in your face. It's not subtle. But it's entertaining, and it's not putting anybody else down."

And, Grant continues, just because audiences no longer see Al Jolson in blackface on screen does not mean the battle is over.

"You got Wesley Snipes jumping off a mountain and shit. He ain't acting. He's doing like Sly Stalone bullshit," Grant admonishes. "But the fact that we have black producers, black directors, black screenwriters helps that much more."

Included on the Broadway side of that list would be George C. Wolfe, "Noise/Funk's" creator and director, who made the L.A. Times' "favorite quote" list when he told them, "I was told by many theater professionals that it would never run. A musical with an all-black cast and some edge? And three years later, ha, ha, ha, we've made a lot of money, thank you very much."

A lot of money and a lot of noise, undoubtedly thanks in part to casting decisions that seek out youth, yes, but experienced youth.

Jeffries, only 17 years old, speaks with maturity about what brought him to the stage and what the stage is bringing to others in his generation.

"I wasn't really interested in seeing Broadway shows until 'Noise/Funk,'" Jeffries says. "But now I'm dying to." The show's subject matter also sparked his interest. "I learned a lot of my history that I didn't know."

Jeffries' prime motivation for joining the show and experimenting with rhythm tap was Grant, whom he's taken lessons from for four years. Even now, they're dancing side-by-side: "He's still kind of a mentor. He's had a lot more experience and a lot more exposure than I have ... Derick is a leader."

Grant, whose performance thus far has escaped the usual critical lament that follows when a show's original star leaves, studied with L.A.'s Jazz Tap Ensemble and his uncle, the renown Paul Kennedy.

He points out that "Noise/Funk's" youthful hip hop flavor is not an abstract product of tap-gone-gangsta: "Everybody wants to do tap to hip hop, but you can't just put on tap shoes and dance to a rap song. That's not going to cut it," Grant says. "We use our shoes as instruments. You're not dancing to a song, you're not putting choreography to a song. You are the song."

This places him on the Gen X legacy, winding back to slavery days: "Black people as a whole have a strong sense of rhythm because for so many centuries, that's been our form of communication," Grant says. "It was spiritual."

Which pulses on through the 20th century: "Whether it's at church or at home or even on the basketball court, we just have a rhythm inside of us that's expressed many different ways ... People used to put bottle caps on the bottom of their shoes and go on the street corner and hit just so they could get a couple of pennies so they could eat, very much the same as cats are doing with break dancing in the '80s."

And explodes dazzlingly on Grant's own family tree: "My grandmother still tap dances and does jazz and stuff," he says, noting that his relatives have seen and absorbed the show. "They want to start creating their own show ... Everybody's hyped, man. Everybody wants to hit it."

Hit it, swing it, breathe it. Swallow the words and feel the funk. Don't worry if it's a little loud. That's just how da Beat is.

bers.

"STOMP, 'Noise/Funk,' all those things are part of the new generation of tap dancers coming through," says Tap Dogs creator Dein Perry. "They're younger and they're doing it their own way."

They owe much of their own way to the Irish, English and African-American dance forms that collided and eventually blended during the 19th century. (One of Riverdance's most lauded scenes depicts two stiff, Irish steppers and two loose-limbed African-American hoofers poking fun at – and later emulating – each other's styles).

Tap was a staple on the vaudeville circuits and later translated smoothly to the big screen in the Busby Berkeley and Fred Astaire/Ginger Rogers musicals of the 1930s.

"But after World War II, those opportunities dried up," explains Rusty Frank, author of "Tap! The Greatest Tap Dance Stars and their Stories." "There was no vaudeville. There were a few Broadway shows and that was it. And tap really suffered."

A self-proclaimed "tap preservationist," Frank was spurred by the death of her dance instructor in 1987 to interview more than 30 aging tap legends about a seemingly waning art form. And some of the jam session's senior members can vividly recall tap's hard times.

"As I kid, I tapped. But as I grew up there was no tap on Broadway, so I had to learn a different kind of dancing," says dancer Alfred Desio. In 1957 he performed Jerome Robbins' modern choreography in the original run of "West Side Story." Later he returned to tap, melding technology with the old rhythms to electrify tap shoes so that they could trigger off-stage instruments, à la Gregory Hines' film "Tap."

Bob Scheerer, a dancer now in his late 60s, also remembers a time when tap faced a shaky future.

"People lost interest in it for some reason," Scheerer says. "The people who saved it were women, curiously enough. Black men for a while kind of shied away from it because it was kind of 'Uncle Tom' for them."

Like nearly every other facet of history, tap has had its share of racial tensions. Though many of its most notable performers were and are African American, finding a stage on which to dance often meant donning a bell hop's uniform and a goofy smile. Bill "Bojangles" Robinson first had to overcome vaudeville's bizarre "two-colored" rule, which stated that no single African-American performer could appear alone on stage. After priding himself on his dashing top-hat-and-tails stage routines, he reluctantly accepted servant roles in four films alongside Shirley Temple.

A segment in "Noise/Funk" dubbed "The Uncle Huck-A-Buck Song" satirizes his decision as the dancer tells a ringleted rag doll "I can make mo' money playin' a maid/than doin' it fo' real." Many Robinson admirers are offended by this and similar scenes. They see the show as accusing African Americans of selling out rather than cultivating their art in the only context available at the time.

"They put them down like they were flunkies for the whites when they were brilliant, brilliant dancers," Scheerer says. "They don't have to do that. The show is so wonderful – I saw it with Savion, and he's brilliant. To have to then turn around and put down one of the old icons is beyond me."

But perhaps acknowledging tap's rich – if mottled – past is part of packaging it for up-and-coming dancers, of which there seem to be an abundance (the touring cast of "Noise/Funk" ranges in age from 15 to 27). And while divided into the "show-tap" styles characterized by upper-body movements and flashy acrobatics, and the close-to-the-floor, sound-oriented rhythm tap of Savion Glover and Gregory Hines, the medium remains an integral part of musical theater.

"We all take tap," says fourth-year theater student Tom Lenk of his fellow performers in UCLA's Musical Theatre Workshop. UCLA does not, however, have a tap department, so students must look off-campus for instruction. "I take tap from our choreographer, Carlos Jones. He's one of the best tap instructors in L.A."

While Lenk still classifies himself as a beginner, workshop member Susannah Hall, a third-year dance student, has been tapping for five years. She explains why this particular genre has echoed throughout musicals, from "42nd Street" to "A Chorus Line" to "Jelly's Last Jam."

"Forms of dance like modern and ballet can work a lot with angst and drama, whereas tap has always been fun. You get the rhythm in your feet ,and it's like a 'put on a happy face' type of thing," Hall says.

Workshop choreographer Carlos Jones adds, "Each person that taps kind of brings their own art to it. And I think that's one of the really wonderful things about tap is that it is an art form where you could share, pass it on. You could have 50 different people in the room, and they could all have their own special type of thing."

So will there be rooms of 50 people? Dance studios packed with children waiting to break in shiny patent-leather tap shoes?

Jam session coordinator Denise Pennington, clad in a sweatshirt and her own worn, flat-heeled shoes (no high heels for her, she says, the sound just isn't loud enough), stands momentarily still, just outside the pounding studio.

"There will be a core of us that keeps it going no matter what happens," Pennington says. "But I think a lot of young kids are becoming more interested in it now. I hear a lot, 'Oh, my kid wants to take tap class.' And I go, 'Yeah! Get 'em some shoes!'" to play the music, but from a lack of attention to it. For a while, Peru banned Afro-Peruvian music because its composers were mostly enslaved.

"The music comes from a place where the people who wrote it and the people who it's written about have suffered so much," Baca comments. "It was very lonely and sad for them since there wasn't a time or place for these people to share their music."

Strong emotions and feelings heavily influence Baca's music. She says one of her works, "Maria Lando," came about through her observations of the extraordinary efforts of women during an economic crisis in Peru.

"It's just the consciousness of women, their survival skills, their love for their children – all of these things that make up a woman is what really inspired me," Baca reveals.

Finally, we land back in America to discover Tish Hinojosa's blend of Southwestern music. A native of south Texas, Hinojosa sings in both Spanish and English.

"(Hinojosa's music) has some folk, rock and some country tinges of music because it's part of what she experienced growing up," Blachly says.

With so many musical and cultural differences, one might think it would be hard to come together in harmony. However, Chiweshe says that the first day these Global Divas met, they started to play music together.

"It wasn't the easiest thing to combine the three of us at first, but we're at a point now in our relationships where we're beginning to share so much," Baca says. "It's amazing when you get the musicians from Zimbabwe to back up Tish and I. That whole mixture is quite impressive."

MUSIC: The Global Divas perform Sunday at 7 p.m. in the Veterans Wadsworth Theater. Tickets are $25, $22 and $10 with UCLA I.D. For more information, call (310) 825-2101.

sympathetic nor wicked, and the viewer doesn't have any concern for his plight.

In addition, the plot is far too confusing. Even after watching the entire movie, it is still unclear who the "bad guys" really are and just what their crimes were. It has something to do with the Chinese mafia and arms smuggling, but that's just about as far as the filmmakers get. They prefer to rely soley upon the presence of Jones to move the story along rather than finding a satisfying conclusion.

All of this would be incidental if the film was at least an exciting action movie. "U.S. Marshals" fails even at staging eye-popping adrenaline boosts. The scant few of these scenes lack any real excitement or intensity. After a few minutes, every action scene degenerates into a standard car chase or on-foot pursuit.

Devotees of the first movie are likely to be bored throughout this lame follow-up. What more can be said than the "almighty dollar" has won out over real film-making once again.

Seniors burn Devils, await 'Cats

M. BASKETBALL: Trio takes turns in limelight, looks forward to Arizona

By Brent Boyd
Daily Bruin Staff

It was only fitting that the final home stand of the collegiate careers of the three Bruin seniors would commence with the Bruin trio dominating the game from beginning to end, ultimately leading the Bruins to victory.

At first, J.R. Henderson was the go-to guy, then Kris Johnson took over, and finally Toby Bailey put the finishing touches on the 102-94 victory over Arizona State in front of 10,290 at Pauley Pavilion Thursday night.

"Before one guy was on, maybe two," Johnson said. "It's never been all three guys just on. The seniors are just clicking and I'm glad to see that we are doing that right now at the right time, hitting our stride."

GENEVIEVE LIANG/Daily Bruin

Kris Johnson scored 23 of his game-high 33 points in the second half to lead the Bruins to a victory over Arizona State, 102-94.

"They don't have too many guys that could come down and guard (Henderson)," Johnson said. "Our game plan was just to go down to him and keep it down low, keep pounding them and get their guys in foul trouble – eventually it paid off for us."

In fact, ASU's two starting forwards fouled out in the game's final moments.

But once halftime rolled around with UCLA leading 47-37, the Bruins jumped off Henderson's back and took a ride on Johnson's.

Johnson hit a three-pointer 16 seconds into the second half and never looked back. He scored 12 points over the first six minutes, which helped UCLA build its largest lead of the game, 71-56.

He finished with a game-high 33 points – 23 of which came in the second half. In addition, he made eight of nine free throws, including six of seven over the final four minutes to help seal the Bruin victory.

"When our backs are against the wall, me and (Johnson) love that situation," Henderson said. "We feel that we can score in any type of situation, the same thing with (Bailey), but it just happened to be me and (Johnson) down low."

Although Bailey didn't dominate a large portion of the game like the other two did – or like he did last week against Washington – he certainly had a key impact, and ultimately clinched the victory.

ASU threatened the Bruin lead when it cut the deficit to 92-89, with under a minute remaining, but that's when Bailey turned it on.

AARON HAND/Daily Bruin

After being fouled on a made bank shot, Bailey converted the free throw to give the Bruins a six-point lead with 53 seconds remaining. On the Sun Devils' next possession he made a huge rebound, then made one of two free throws after he was fouled again.

Finally a tomahawk slam dunk followed by an assist to Johnson on his dunk slammed the door on the Sun Devils.

"(Henderson) was real hot, so was (Johnson) and I just had to wait my turn," said Bailey, who finished with 22 points and eight rebounds. "I can't remember a time when all of us played as good as tonight."

But the Bruin trio knows that if they are to have any shot at upsetting second-ranked Arizona (27-4, 17-1) Saturday, they will need to play just as well.

W. BASKETBALL: Victory in Arizona helps ensure invitation to tournament

By Chris Umpierre
Daily Bruin Contributor

If the tournament committee needed any more evidence to select the UCLA women's basketball team into the field of 64, the Bruins gave them more than some on Thursday night.

Playing without much of the services of their All-American candidate Maylana Martin, the No. 23 Bruins (19-7 overall, 14-3 in the Pac-10) whipped up on the Arizona State Devils, 80-62, before 883 at the University Activity Center in Tempe, Arizona.

UCLA, who hasn't been to the tournament in six years, has won 14 of their last 16 games and appears to now be a shoe-in for the tournament when selections are announced on Sunday.

A victory over No. 9 Arizona, who they play on Saturday in Tucson, would not only put the cap on the best season in recent years for UCLA women's basketball but possibly give the Bruins a chance to host a first-round tournament game.

The Bruins sure looked like a tournament team on Thursday night despite playing without their floor leader Martin.

Martin, who has been bothered by a sore back all year long, was able to play just 11 minutes in Thursday's game.

Martin, who averages 19.2 points and 7.8 rebounds a game, made those

BYU posts challenge to UCLA's supremacy

M. VOLLEYBALL: Match against Cougars could be toughest this year

By Grace Wen
Daily Bruin Staff

The UCLA men's volleyball team will face its toughest challenge yet this weekend.

The top-ranked Bruins will host No. 3 BYU on Friday and Saturday night. Both matches start at 7 p.m. in Pauley Pavilion.

Last year, UCLA (16-0, 10-0 MPSF) came away with a pair of close wins at BYU. The Cougars are notorious for winning at home but do not always play well on the road. This year this preseason No. 1 team has already dropped two matches to Pepperdine on the road, a team that UCLA defeated in five games.

The Cougars (7-2, 7-2 MPSF) return five starters from last year's squad. In addition, BYU has added Shane Van Beest, a member of the Australian National Team, to further strengthen its squad.

Van Beest and 1997 MPSF player of the year Ryan Millar currently rank one and two in the nation in blocking with 2.83 and 2.25 blocks per game, respectively. BYU leads the nation in blocking, averaging 9.48 blocks per game.

"Millar is just a great middle blocker," UCLA head coach Al Scates said. "Millar is an outstanding player so now they're really strong in the middle and so are we. This should be a very interesting matchup."

While UCLA's middle blockers don't put up the same blocking numbers, it is the hitting contributions of Tom Stillwell and Adam Naeve that have given

Filling in the blank

Jeff Blank more than fulfills the duties required of a sports information director, getting publicity for UCLA's baseball team

DAVID HILL

Baseball Sports Information Director Jeff Blank announces during a baseball game.

By Vytas Mazeika
Daily Bruin Staff

People call him Jeff Blank. The baseball players have nicknamed him SID. You, the regular fan, probably don't even know he exists.

Since Blank works behind the scenes, the common fan is not expected to be familiar with him. He's the sports information director (SID) for the baseball team. His job is to get the team the publicity it deserves. He must also make sure every home game runs smoothly. Blank must deal with media requests, painstakingly punch in all the statistics into a computer after every game is over, and on top of all that, he must go to class.

Blank works at least 60 to 70 hours a week on baseball alone, and the select few who are aware of his contribution to the team let their appreciation be known.

"He's loved by the players on this team," UCLA baseball head coach Gary Adams explained. "He isn't just plain and simply liked. They love him because they see a guy so unselfishly dedicated to his job. What rewards does he get? He's a special guy.

"Hey, if we were better looking, I'd let him marry my daughter."

Within the UCLA Sports Information Department, there are 10 SID's assigned to the many sports at the university. The head of the department is Marc Dellins – a former baseball SID himself. Dellins is the media relations director and contact for two premiere sports – football and men's basketball.

"My job is to supervise the employees in the office, plus I work on sports myself," Dellins, who interacts with Athletic Director Pete Dalis on a daily basis, said. "Our goal is to try and create maximum publicity opportunity for all of the various sports at UCLA."

Dellins supervises three other students and six non-students. The non-students are Elaine Adams (women's volleyball, tennis), Bill Bennett (men's basketball, cross country and track and field), Rich Bertolucci (men's volleyball, golf), Liza David (men's soccer, women's basketball, gymnastics), Danny Harrington (softball, swimming) and Steve Rourke (football, women's basketball).

The three students are Shira Andron (women's soccer), Blank (baseball) and Shana Silberman (water polo).

When Blank was a freshman at UCLA four years ago, he knew that he wanted to be affiliated with sports in some manner.

Early in the fall of 1994, Blank was looking for a copy of the Daily Bruin. He thought the sports section was a completely different paper, because he believed the back page was actually the front page of a different paper. So it took him a while before he found a Bruin stand where the paper was turned over and showed the sports section.

Then he saw an ad for a baseball "SID" and inquired about the position at the Morgan Center. The appeal of a job where you're asked to attend baseball games on a regular basis and travel with the team to places like Hawaii was enough to make him commit to the position.

But like every dream job, the description is far better than the job itself. Blank had no idea just how much work being an SID entailed, and the glamour of being around athletes dissipates when one finds out about a typical weekend.

"This is not glamorous because people don't want to be doing this," Blank explained. "When the team is home for the weekend, my weekend is shot. I am getting up at six in the morning to prepare the program, and sitting in the press box on a freezing Friday night while trying to fax results to papers trying to meet a deadline."

Blank has spearheaded a huge turnaround in the baseball SID front. His 1997 media guide was voted No. 1 in the district, and he always seems to go a step beyond his duties. Blank has outshined his predecessor John Dolak.

"Oh, (Blank is) easily (better)," senior second baseman Nick Theodorou, who was at UCLA while Dolak was the baseball SID, said. "Best one in the country. You could ask him about stats two years ago and he'd still remember them ... There's no doubt that he works harder than anyone else behind the scenes."

On Tuesday, the day of UCLA's 21-5 loss to Long Beach State, Blank was in the office immediately after his 9 a.m. class. Then from about 10 a.m. until 3:30 p.m., Blank was in his Morgan Center office, working on the program and other random things.

He punches in a barrage of statistics into a Macintosh computer while answering phone calls from the outside. That particular day an impromptu meeting was held to brainstorm for an athlete who has something hard to overcome.

NBC is looking for local athletes with feel-good stories, and Blank immediately thinks of getting some publicity for senior pitcher John Phillips. After undergoing Tommy John surgery to repair damage to his throwing elbow, Phillips has made a miraculous recovery and Blank could help him get more recognition with a story. Therefore, Blank calls the respective people at NBC and after a brief conversation, will fax over a brief Phillips synopsis. Blank prides himself on seeing his players get publicity.

"I definitely think he does a good job," Harrington said. "After the game people write a summary of the game. Well, Jeff writes like four recaps involving different players, and faxes it over to their hometown. That takes a lot of time and effort."

After the release is pretty much done and game time approaches, the coach stops by around 2 p.m. Blank and Adams talk for a little while, before Adams must get going to prepare for the game. Once 4 p.m. approaches, Blank goes to his apartment to pick up his fax machine. Then he goes directly to the field, where more duties await.

Blank deals with the media, UCLA coaches, players and the opposing team's SID while at Jackie Robinson Stadium. He is also the PA

GYMNASTICS BRIEFS:

The UCLA women's gymnastics team (11-2) competes tonight at Oregon State University's Shanico Invitational, where they will face, in addition to No. 14 OSU, George Washington and Seattle-Pacific.

With Regionals less than a month away and the team battling injury problems, UCLA head coach Valorie Kondos is focusing on keeping the team healthy and well-rested.

Remaining healthy has been difficult for the Bruins, who lost senior Carmen Tausend last week when she tore her anterior collateral ligament, ending her collegiate career. Throughout the week, UCLA has prepared for tonight's meet by physically resting and emotionally keeping its spirits up.

"We have been working on rest and motivation," Kondos said. "About four years (ago) I changed my tactics because or win loss record does not matter, we train through the season. Those athletes that have their routines down are learning new skills, so they do not even do the routines they are competing with on weekends during the week."

Junior Kiralee Hayashi and sophomore Heidi Moneymaker have helped the team keep their energy and practices running well when the Bruins are down. "Consistently Kiralee and Heidi, because of their work ethic in the gym, really keep things going," Kondos said. "Also, we are getting Mohini Bhardwaj back on beam and bars, so that is exciting and helps boost morale every time a teammate comes back into the lineup."

Ready for a championship run

TRACK: Led by last year's stars, teams set for start of collegiate competition

By Alvin Cadman and Donald Morrison
Daily Bruin Contributors

After nearly two months of competing on the road in various individual competitions, the UCLA track and field teams come home this weekend for their first collegiate team competition of the season.

Drake Stadium will play host to UC Santa Barbara, Long Beach State and Cal State Los Angeles at the all-day meet, which will be scored as both a quadrangular and dual competition. UCLA, the defending 1997 Pac-10 conference champs, should have relatively little trouble in disposing of their three opponents.

In Westwood, the women will be led on the field by seniors Suzy Powell and Nada Kawar, both of whom should win their respective events. Powell is the collegiate record holder in the discus, setting the mark of 214-0 in her hometown of Modesto less than a year ago. Currently, she's ranked first in the country in the women's discus, and fifth in the javelin. She competed in the discus for the United States at the 1996 Summer Olympic Games.

Kawar, who is entered in the shot and the discus, is ranked No. 2 in the NCAA indoor shot with a season-best of 57-0. This mark is also her personal best, and the fourth best in school history. At the 1997 Pac-10s, she took first and fourth in the shot put and discus, respectively.

Highly touted juniors and 1997 All-Americans Joanna Hayes and Andrea Anderson will make their 1998 home debut on Saturday. Hayes, currently ranked 10th in the United States in the 400-meter hurdles, has the second-best 100 hurdles time in the nation and will anchor UCLA's 4-by-100m relay. Anderson, the second leg on the 4-by-100m relay, won the 200 and took second in the 400 at the 1997 Pac-10 championships. Along with freshman 200 standout Shakedia Jones, the UCLA women should compete well, as they did when they swept Cal State Los Angeles, UC Santa Barbara and Long Beach State at this meet a year ago.

"We will have a good mix of returning veterans with incoming talented high school athletes," said UCLA women's head coach Jeannette Bolden, the Pac-10 Coach of the Year. "We're looking forward to defending our Pac-10 title and want to challenge LSU for the NCAA Outdoor Crown."

The men's track team will also use their first outdoor home meet of the season as a tune-up for future outdoor meets.

Although Arizona was upset by USC Thursday night – ruining the Wildcats' chances of becoming the first Pac-10 team ever to go through the conference season undefeated – they remain one of the most explosive and talented teams in the nation.

They were on a 19-game winning streak with their previous losses coming to top-ranked Duke, No. 3 Kansas and Florida State.

This game takes on added importance for the Bruin seniors since it will be their final game in Pauley.

"This game will be the most exciting of our career other than the NCAA championship game, just because it's Arizona," Johnson said. "It's our last game, and we've had an intense rivalry through the years with them and they're trying to come into our house on our last game.

"And from an emotional standpoint I think the three seniors are just going to step up and play the game of our lives. And Miles (Simon) is talking trash."

Oh yeah, that.

In a series where neither team needs extra motivation to get fired up for its arch-rival, Arizona's star guard has given the Bruins a little bulletin board material.

When Simon thought the Wildcats would come into Westwood undefeated in the conference, he said he was planning on partying on the floor with his buddies for a couple of hours.

"That bulletin board stuff is what got us all excited," Johnson said.

No matter how excited they are, though, Johnson and the rest of the Bruins know they need to do one thing to beat Arizona.

"We need to play our butts off."

Thursday was a good start.

UCLA a perfect record. Both players are hitting over .400 to place the Bruins at third in the nation in hitting.

Scates believes that conditioning will also play a key factor in Saturday night's match.

"We play them twice in a row, which is interesting because whoever is in the best shape will probably win the second match," Scates said. "If we just continue to hit for a high average we'll win. Our offense has really been hot lately. The nice thing is that Brandon can give the ball to anybody and get good results."

Stillwell is also confident of the the Bruins' chances.

"We just need to play like we've been playing, play our game and I'm confident we can beat anyone," Stillwell said. "They'll be challenging us pretty good so if we're not playing hard they can beat us. We need to come out and play our game and hopefully we'll win."

If UCLA defeats BYU, the Bruins will have beaten every team ranked in the top five. This weekend's matches will also have implications on the future, as UCLA would be able to secure home-court advantage for the conference playoffs with a pair of wins.

BYU Coach Carl McGown is well aware of the importance of this weekend.

"We'll find out how good we are when we play UCLA, the nation's best team," McGown said.

The Bruins will attempt to complete their fifth consecutive season undefeated in dual meet competition.

"The athletes have been training for a long time, so a lot them are really anxious to get going," UCLA head coach Bob Larsen. "I think the returning athletes take it in stride early in the season. I think the team will come out and compete well."

The quad-meet will feature sprinters Damian Allen and Bryan Harrison. Harrison will run his first-ever collegiate 100-meter dash and will also race in the 4-by-100 meter and 4-by-400 meter relays. Allen will run in the 400 along with Michael Granville.

Mark Hauser will run in the 800 instead of his normal events, the 3,000 and 1,500. Jess Strutzel will run his first collegiate 1,500. Travis Haynes, one of UCLA's best shot putters, will only compete in the discus.

Taking Saturday off to rest before the indoor nationals will be Mebrahtom Keflezighi and Mel Moultry. High-jumper Rich Pitchford will not compete due to soreness in his knee, and pole vaulter Scott Slover is doubtful for Saturday's meet.

announcer, and must keep the stats so that the box score is promptly available after the game. Finally, he must answer phone calls – usually a parent calling to find out how their son is doing.

"Jeff Blank is a great guy and he's been real fun with (my phone calls)," Victor Santora said. Santora, who called three times before the first inning ended on Tuesday, is arguably the parent who calls most often. "We kid and joke with each other. And usually, if it's not too busy, he'll talk to me. We've got a real good running thing going."

Once the game is over, Blank stays in the press box during a freezing Tuesday. He faxes recaps to the L.A. Times, the Associated Press, Baseball America and other media outlets.

Sometimes Blank is in the press box by himself, even after the coach goes home.

He must sometimes drop or reschedule classes because of the many games he must attend. But for the past four years, Blank has made it to all 208 games, making him the "Cal Ripken Jr" of SID's – only senior outfielder Eric Byrnes can claim perfect attendance along with Blank (Coach Adams was suspended for four games at the end of the 1996 season).

"I think it's pretty safe to say that I'm the only student in the country that runs baseball on a full-time basis and travels with the team," Blank said. "It's a very time-consuming job. It's a lot of stuff. Some of it is not brain work. But it's very time-consuming when you're a student."

When the Bruins made the College World Series last year, Blank experienced a new level of chaos. The phone was ringing off the hook, and everyone wanted to talk to star shortstop Troy Glaus (now with the Anaheim Angels).

Throughout all the madness, Blank has still managed to be accepted to law school. He hopes to someday work for a professional team, or become involved with contract law.

"If someone could do it, I think Jeff could," Rick Thorpe, the marketing director for the UCLA baseball team, said. "He totally dives iuto anything he wants to work on. I heard him talking about spending all of his time studying on the plane back and forth when they took their trip to Hawaii or any other road trips. If he's not in the office working on baseball issues, he's at home or in the library studying on his classes."

Blank has almost perfected the job of baseball SID. He does things that Adams never even thought of asking a SID do – including scouting and follow-ups on players who have graduated or left for the major leagues.

"I've been here a long time and I've had some good ones," Adams said. "I never thought there could be anybody better than my very first one: Marc Dellins. Marc was superb, but 'SID', I gotta say even in front of Marc Dellins – and he'll read this in the paper – I give the slight edge to SID."

Adams compared Blank and Dellins to Babe Ruth and Joe DiMaggio – with the slight edge going to Ruth.

Blank may be back next season, as he's contemplating taking a year off school to put more time into baseball. He hopes to train the next baseball SID in 1999 and make the transition less tumultuous. Players, though, believe no one can take their SID's place.

"We would absolutely love to have SID around (next year)," pitcher Rob Henkel, Blank's roommate during the College World Series, said. "The next Sports Information Director will be nothing compared to this guy. He's done so much for this program, and we'd be lost without him."

BASBALL BRIEFS:

Unranked UCLA (8-11, 3-5 in Six-Pac) hosts the No. 8 Sun Devils (13-5, 3-2) for three games this weekend. The competition does not seem to be getting any easier.

ASU will be sending two of the best left-handers in the nation to the mound: juniors Ryan Mills (3-2, 3.29 ERA) and Phill Lowery (3-2, 3.86). Both pitchers are coming off losses to Stanford at Tempe last weekend but hope to rebound against the Bruins.

UCLA will counter with right-handers John Phillips (0-1, 11.25) and Chad Cislak (2-3, 7.45) for those two games. Sunday the Bruins will send an unnamed pitcher to the mound against the Sun Devils' spot starter Richy Leon (1-0, 1.08), who has the second-lowest ERA on the ASU pitching staff and also plays the infield.

The pitching comparison doesn't get much better for the Bruins, who have the highest team ERA (7.58) in the Pac-10 Southern Division. Arizona State has the third-best staff in the league at 3.93. Their ace closer Chuck Crumpton boasts the No.1 ERA (0.93) in the division. No UCLA pitchers appear in the Top 10.

Arizona State has the upper hand in terms of pitching, but the Bruins have an advantage in offense. UCLA is fourth in the Six-Pac in team batting with an overall average of .296 while ASU is fifth with .291.

Congratulations to Our 15 Senior Spotlights!

Bruinlife Yearbook would like to congratulate the 15 winners of the Senior Spotlight Award.

We would also like to thank all who expressed interest and took the time to apply.

Good luck and continued success in your future endeavors.

The Senior Spotlight Award was developed to recognize distinguished UCLA seniors. These talented students are chosen from a large number of senior applicants, each of which has excelled in many areas during their career at UCLA. Each year these "spotlighted" graduates receive a special page in their honor in the senior section of the Bruinlife Yearbook. This special recognition of outstanding seniors is unique to Bruinlife and is only one of the many interesting ways UCLA and its students are captured in the yearbook.

Today, Bruinlife would like to recognize Catherine Krum for her outstanding achievements. Read about her, along with these fourteen other Senior Spotlights, only in this year's Bruinlife Yearbook:

11 minutes productive as she scored 12 points on 5 of 7 shooting before she asked to be taken out of the game because of the pain from her lower back.

Playing without much of their leading scorer and rebounder, the Bruins showed their great depth throughout the game as seven players came off the bench to score 28 points.

UCLA's bench once again beat the opposition as the Bruins' bench outscored the Sun Devils, 28-18. This made it the 22nd time in 26 games that the Bruins' bench has beaten the opposition's bench.

Leading the Bruin charge off the bench in the Sun Devil game was freshman LaCresha Flannigan.

The 5-foot-8-inch shooting guard from San Bernardino sparkled for the Bruins as she poured in 10 points and pulled down four rebounds.

UCLA came out of the locker room on fire in the first half. Hitting on a remarkable 20 of 34 from the floor for 59 percent in the game's first 20 minutes. Flannigan's superb play and another great game from sophomore Marie Philman, who finished with a team-high 14 points, helped contribute to the offensive effort.

Their hot shooting in the first half built a sizable 46-21 Bruin lead at halftime and the team never had to look back again.

UCLA will now travel to Tucson to take on the No. 9 Arizona Wildcats (20-6 overall, 13-4 in the Pac-10) on Saturday.

Since UCLA has only beaten two ranked teams in the year (Washington and Duke), a win against highly-ranked Arizona would greatly help the team's chances of garnering a high seed in the tournament.

The game also takes on great importance because of momentum, which is key for a successful run in the tournament. The team has won four in a row and a loss on Saturday could help make Mr. Momentum put on a different jersey.

But in order for UCLA to beat the Wildcats, they will have to stop Arizona's All-American candidate Adia Barnes.

The senior forward is averaging a Pac-10 leading 21.7 points and 6.8 boards a game.

Barnes was a key force when the two teams met in Pauley Pavilion for the Pac-10 opener on January 2nd, which was a 82-71 victory for the Wildcats.

As the second-leading scorer in Arizona women's basketball history, Barnes scored 20 points and grabbed seven rebounds in that game.

But when Barnes and the rest of the Wildcats take on UCLA on Saturday, they will be facing a completely different Bruin team than they did in January.

The UCLA team that will walk into the McKale Center is a much more confident squad.

Since the two teams met in January, UCLA has won 13 of their last 15 games.

How to Write an Effective Ad
- Start your ad with the merchandise you are selling. This makes it easier for readers to quickly scan the ads and locate your items.
- Always include the price of your item. Many classified readers simply do not respond to ads without prices.
- Avoid abbreviations—make your ad easy for readers to understand.
- Place yourself in the reader's position, ask what you would like to know about the merchandise, and include that in the ad. Include such information as brand names, colors and other specific descriptions.

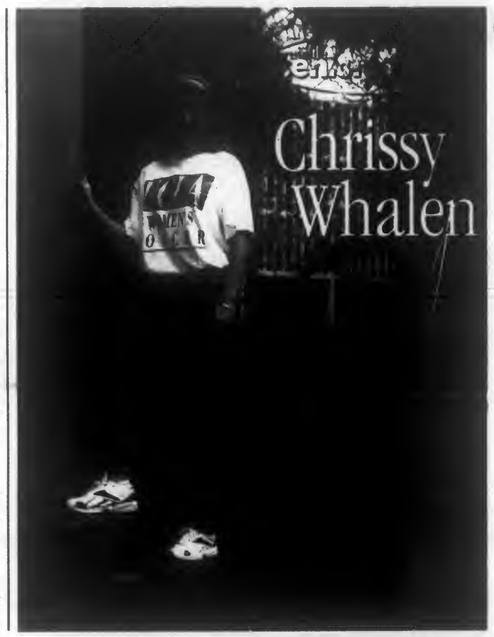
Bruinlife Yearbook would like to congratulate the 15 winners of the Senior Spotlight Award.

We would also like to thank all who expressed interest and took the time to apply.

Good luck and continued success in your future endeavors.



Congratulations to Our 15 Senior Spotlights!

The Senior Spotlight Award was developed to recognize distinguished UCLA seniors. These talented students are chosen from a large number of senior applicants, each of which has excelled in many areas during their career at UCLA. Each year these "spotlighted" graduates receive a special page in their honor in the senior section of the Bruinlife Yearbook. This special recognition of outstanding seniors is unique to Bruinlife and is only one of the many interesting ways UCLA and its students are captured in the yearbook.

Today, Bruinlife would like to recognize Chrissy Whalen for her outstanding achievements. Read about her, along with these fourteen other Senior Spotlights, only in this year's Bruinlife Yearbook:

Program examines cultural issues

ACADEMICS: Curriculum integrates public health, specific Asian concerns

By Teresa Jun
Daily Bruin Contributor

UCLA recently created the nation's first joint master's program in public health and Asian American studies.

The concurrent degree program, which enables students to earn two degrees within three years, is designed to combine a professional background in public health with a strong awareness of relevant Asian American social issues.

"The program provides the education and opportunities for students to integrate their expertise in public health with their knowledge in how culture and history affect the special needs of the Asian American population," said Cindy Fan, chair of the Asian American studies program.

Such integration of the two fields is becoming a critical need in various Asian American communities, according to Marjorie Kagawa-Singer, director of the concurrent program. "We're all very excited about this program because it's really beginning to address some important issues," she expressed.

> The new program hopes to address ... a better representation of all the Asian populations in America.

Thai populations, for example, currently experience the highest rate of AIDS among all of the Asian/Pacific Islander communities living in America.

Yet, these rates may not improve if specific cultural issues don't start receiving more attention in the medical arena, Kagawa-Singer suggested.

"Issues of shame and stigma are strong in Asian American cultures," she said. "If people within the community don't want to talk about it, and the mainstream doesn't know about it, you can't address the problem. The high-risk behaviors leading to AIDS in these populations aren't changing because the knowledge isn't out there."

The program director also attributes the lack of medical knowledge within Asian American communities to certain persisting cultural myths.

"(Asian Americans) think they're not vulnerable, and continue their high-risk behaviors," Kagawa-Singer said.

Breast cancer is another disease that is subjected to false beliefs.

While breast cancer shows up in Asian American women at higher rates than their counterparts in their native countries, many Asian American women still think this is

Developers vie for support of retail projects in Westwood

FORUM: Residents still skeptical as to how each plan will become reality

By Rachel Muñoz
Daily Bruin Staff

At the Westside Urban Forum last Friday, a new generation of Westwood developers tried to sell their plans to a skeptical audience.

"Westwood is known nationally as a special place," began mediator Woodie Tescher, the director of Urban Planning and Design.

Tescher briefly spoke of a time when Westwood Village was one with UCLA and its residents. The village offered a wide array of services while supporting the university and the residents. But times have changed, and he now believes that the village has become more segregated from the campus.

Fortunately, the times have changed, and the seeds of new beginnings are starting to grow. In the past few years, over 60 percent of the property in the village has changed ownership.

Tescher explained that the Westside Urban Forum felt this was the most opportune time to bring together the key players in Westwood and see the possibilities of Westwood's future.

Hands jerked up after his talk with questions about the two projects' plans, and whether Macy's department store will stay in Westwood.

Bob Walsh of the Westwood Community Alliance and board member of the Business Improvement District for Westwood, explained that the Westwood program came forward in the early 1990s with three main goals: moving forward with city-owned parking, creating the streetscape improvement program, and developing the Business Improvement District.

Since that program was put into action over two years ago, crime statistics have improved dramatically and cultural arts has become a focus for Westwood, with new holiday decorations and summer concerts.

"Truly, the future of Westwood is ahead of us," said Walsh.

UCLA's position in Westwood, past and present, was also a key issue of the panel.

"UCLA has a historic relationship and broad interest here," said Peter Blackman, UCLA administrative vice chancellor. As a major tenant in Westwood, UCLA is interested in a village that is economically viable. He believes that an unsuccessful village will reflect poorly on UCLA.

Blackman's short speech was followed by Allen Abshez, the project

Beloved professor honored posthumously

SYMPOSIUM: Friends, colleagues look back at life of Julian Eule

By Chauntelle Tibbals
Daily Bruin Contributor

On Friday, deceased UCLA law Professor Julian N. Eule was honored with an emotional symposium. Family, friends and colleagues gathered to remember and admire Eule's brilliance and tireless love of teaching.

Eule began teaching at UCLA law school in 1984. He served as associate dean from 1992 to 1995.

Susan W. Prager, the law school dean, gave an introductory speech, describing Eule's "passion for life that permeated in all (things he did)."

"Julian loved people, and that made his interactions real," Prager said.

She related personal anecdotes about Eule's "passions, accomplishments and irreverence" with the law and with the university.

One such story pertained to Eule's skills in recruiting new faculty members, which was one of his duties as associate dean.

He had an informal, casual method of recruiting new faculty members. He would call up potential employees without notice "just to check in. He was being genuinely friendly," Prager said.

"He was a really good recruiter ... He helped people think about their teaching and beginning their scholarly careers ... His only reservation about being associate dean was that he would teach fewer classes and get to know fewer students," Prager said.

He was in the midst of researching and writing his article, "Transporting First Amendment Norms to the Private Sector: With Every Wish There Comes a Curse," at the time of his death.

The paper was subsequently finished and presented on Friday by Eule's close friend and colleague Jonathan D. Varat, a professor at the UCLA School of Law.

Although the two men had "strikingly different personalities," Varat said, "it was a true labor of love recreating and consistently producing Julian's original intent."

Varat said he felt it was "a project with an immeasurable amount of personal worth."

Despite his conflicting views with Eule about First Amendment rights pertaining to free speech, Varat said he wanted to "allow Julian's clear, strong voice to appear unedited."

The newly-presented work was subsequently critiqued by Erwin Chemerinsky, a professor at the USC Law Center.

In addition to continuing his own work, Chemerinsky assumed responsibility of Eule's classes when he became too ill to resume teaching last spring.

Like Varat, he claimed to disagree with Eule's views on the First Amendment, but was quick to remember how skillfully Eule could defend his arguments.

"For every argument I had, (Eule) had three answers ... with citations," said Chemerinsky, reflecting on a discussion he and Eule once had about the paper's thesis.

Law professors from other esteemed universities such as Cornell and Harvard came to the symposium to pay their respects to Eule as well as to present commentaries on subjects related to Eule's paper.

Eule attended the State University of New York at Stony Brook, where he met his future wife. He obtained his law degree from Cornell in 1973 and his LL.M. from Harvard Law School in 1977.

From 1977-1984 Eule taught and served as associate dean at Temple University Law School in Philadelphia.

Julian Eule passed away from Hodgkin's disease at the age of 47.

Prager said that the UCLA law school expressed reservations when it was considering hiring Eule in 1982 because of his progressing illness.

These hesitations were overshadowed by Eule's qualifications, and he was hired by UCLA in 1984. His first paper was published in the UCLA Law Review.

In 1988, Eule won the Rutter Award for excellence in teaching. Three UCLA graduating law classes named him teacher of the year.

"Julian made a pervasive difference in this institution; he will always be a part of it," Prager stated.

Eule died of Hodgkin's disease on Jan. 30, 1997. He was 47.

COMMUNITY BRIEFS

Symposium addresses sexual orientation law

The UCLA Women's Law Journal held a symposium about "Queer Matters and Emerging Issues in Sexual Orientation Law" on Saturday.

"We wanted to reach out to the community with a broad topic," said Sandra Bernal, co-editor in chief of the Women's Law Journal and third-year law student. "Most symposiums are aimed at topics for professors and law school students."

Professors, lawyers, law students and undergraduates attended the symposium to hear contemporary issues about gay and lesbian rights.

Last week, the U.S. Supreme Court heard a case on same-sex harassment in the workplace, Oncale vs. Sundowner Offshore Service, Inc. It decided that same-sex harassment is illegal.

"We picked (this topic) because it is a timely issue and also something not explored at this law school at this level," she said.

The Women's Law Journal holds a symposium every two years. Michelle Ahnn, Kemmofer Dirlom and Lara Herrington also helped organize the event.

The symposium covered a variety of topics such as sexual orientation bias in employment, lesbian legal theory, as well as same-sex marriage rights, among others.

William Ruberstein, a professor at the UCLA law school, opened the symposium with comments on the symposium and stories about his experiences as a queer law school student. "What we do here is rebellious and unruly," he said, tongue-in-cheek.

He also talked about the relationship between sexual orientation and gender. He joined the Women's Law Journal during his time in law school.

"In 1983 I learned about feminine jurisprudence and gay law," he said. "These information you could only get from the Women's Law Journal."

The first panel included Sheila Kuehl, Speaker Pro Tempore of the California State Assembly. She was the first openly homosexual to be elected to the Assembly.

"The development of these theories and the publication of them is important," she said, also talking about the legislation she has supported to prohibit discrimination against gay and lesbian communities.

"If the law is on your side, pound the law. If the facts are on your side, pound the facts. If nothing is on your side, pound the table."

House committee discusses loan rates

A House subcommittee confronted the major obstacle in its path to renewing the nation's higher education law that provides most of the federal student aid on Thursday, when congressmen tackled the sticky issue of student loan interest rates.

Rep. Bill Goodling, R-Pa., chairman of the full House Committee on Education and the Workforce, said time was running out to find a middle ground between interest rates low enough to appeal to financially strapped students but high enough for banks to want to provide student loans.

The Higher Education Act must be reauthorized by July 1 or it will expire, but Goodling said he wanted the interest rate problem resolved in the next two weeks. The committee can't vote on the entire reauthorization of the law without that roadblock cleared, and committee members hopes to move the legislation to the House floor before the spring recess in April.

"This means everything for the people at home," Goodling said. "If we don't find a compromise and the lenders walk out, this could mean disaster."

The Higher Education Act provides for most federal student aid programs, such as work-study, Stafford loans and Pell Grants. Congress worked for two years to overhaul the act before reauthorizing it in July 1992. Many of the programs that help students pay for postsecondary education expire this year, and the new interest rate index is scheduled to take effect on July 1.

MURPHY'S LAW

Employees working in the administration building are students just trying to help, not sadistic, power-mad mutants

By Starr Keilman
Daily Bruin Contributor

Many UCLA students find it extremely painful to venture into the administration building, and they attempt to avoid it at all costs. Long lines, big hassles and the "rude people" who work behind those glass windows make going to Murphy Hall an unpleasant experience for some.

However, there are those who wake up everyday and trudge through Murphy Hall's doors. They are the "rude people" who work there, and one may find that they are not all rude. In fact, many of them are only trying to help UCLA's students.

Murphy Hall is the home of many administrative offices. Included in these offices are the Main Cashier's Office, Student Accounting, the Registrar's Office and Financial Aid. Students deal with the Main Cashier's Office and Student Accounting most frequently during their stay at UCLA.

Farzana Hossain, a recent graduate of Cal State Northridge, has only been working for the Main Cashier's office for eight months, and she has already adapted to the complicated life there. Hossain's duties include working at the window processing payments, answering phone calls and balancing Bruin Direct.

Watching Hossain work and interact with the students, it is apparent that she is anything but rude. In fact, the thing she enjoys most about her job is "being able to answer students questions correctly and to direct them in the right direction."

Stephen Ingram, who works in Murphy Hall's student accounting office, agrees with Hossain. He also attempts to make students' trips to Murphy as painless as possible. Ingram tries his best to mediate between the campus and its clients.

He describes his overall work as doing "everything to help the client while still abiding by the institution's instructions."

Ingram has worked in Student Accounting for six years, not only working with those attempting to understand their bills but also handling all of the returned checks from students, non-students and various other on-campus stations such as housing and parking. Ingram is also the campus bankruptcy coordinator.

While students may be very conscious of their own frustrations with Murphy, few may consider the frustrations of working there – and there are more than a few.

During peak times, a cashier at the Main Cashier's Office may process as many as 2,000 to 3,000 transactions in a single day. Those who work in Student Accounting don't have much idle time either.

Ingram says the most frustrating part of his work lies in "the fact that (the students) are so quick to blame the system because they don't understand the system. By the system I mean BAR (Billing and Accounts Receivable) and university policies."

Ingram says he thinks that if students would get familiar with their accounting information it would lower the frustration for both themselves and employees.

Hossain says she thinks relations between students and administrative offices could definitely improve if students read the information sent to them. However, she also admits more students would probably read the information if it were better summarized and less detailed.

One of the most common complaints of students is that they have to go to too many different offices before they are actually helped. Chris Armbruster, a first-year business/economics student, understands this criticism. He has found that there is some miscommunication between the different offices.

Both students and employees recognize the need to improve communication between the different administrative offices. In order to reduce the chances of wrongly referring students to other offices, workers need to learn more about what each of the other offices does.

Suggestions for improving communication between offices include more inter-office meetings and a newsletter describing the current activities of each office. Students also proposed putting a directory at the entrance, describing the responsibilities of each department, so that they can figure out where to go.

College life offers more than its share of stress, and the added worry about bills, due dates and late fees is something students do not need.

Parking enforcement targets misuse of disabled placards

HANDICAPPED: Abuses of system spur re-evaluation of current UCLA policies

By Scot Sargeant
Daily Bruin Contributor

UCLA parking enforcement has decided to begin charging disabled drivers to park on campus.

Because some may be tempted to borrow disabled parking placards, UCLA Parking Enforcement has implemented measures to prevent the misuse of disabled parking placards.

"We do have a big disabled placard parking problem on the campus – in terms of misuse of placards," said Steve Rand, manager of enforcement, traffic and adjudication.

Three years ago, legislature added a section to the California Vehicle Code that allows parking enforcement officers, rather than just sworn police officers, to approach people who are driving vehicles displaying placards.

"It is designed to ensure that placards are being used by legitimate placard holders, and they're being used appropriately," Rand said.

People who aren't legitimately disabled are borrowing placards from disabled drivers, therefore allowing them to park close to campus resources and not pay parking fees. Also, people are acquiring placards when they are not actually disabled.

Currently, drivers with a placard are not required to pay UCLA parking fees when parking in handicapped spots, regular spots, along green curbs and at meters.

However, this will soon change.

"Because of this problem, we will now be implementing the requirement that staff, students and faculty display both the placard and the UCLA parking permit," he continued. Disabled drivers will be paying full price for UCLA parking permits.

This enforcement program works by having teams of two enforcement officers choose a parking area. They will approach someone who is parking or getting into a car with a placard displayed, state who they are and explain the purpose of the program.

They will then ask to see the placard, the registration card that goes with the placard and photo identification.

"If everything matches, then great, the placard is being used appropriately, and the people can go on their way," Rand said.

However, if they do not possess these items, three things will happen.

The placard will be confiscated, a citation will be issued and the driver will be accounted for the spot in which they are parked.

The fine for misuse of a placard is $500 – the highest fine a parking enforcement can issue. If the driver is found parked in a disabled spot, an additional fine of $300 will be assessed.

"The point of the enforcement program on the campus is to make sure that people who (misuse the placards) are not going to be allowed to get away with it," Rand said.

"It is not the intent of the placards, and it is absolutely having a negative impact on legitimate disabled users of parking facilities on campus," he continued.

However, some confusion may arise

Speaker offers words of wisdom for new millennium

SPIRITUALITY: Author stresses importance of striving for healthy soul

By Michael Weiner
Daily Bruin Contributor

The millennium is upon us, and the only way we can cope is reintroducing spirituality into our lives, said Iyanla Vanzant, an author of bestselling books on self-empowerment and spiritual growth, in a speech last Thursday.

"What I've really been sharing with people are the tools and the principles that are integral to our spiritual growth," Vanzant said to the audience in the James West Alumni Center.

Vanzant's purpose is to try to get people to infuse spirituality into everything they do.

"My prayer is that people will begin to integrate spirituality into their everyday living," Vanzant said.

She emphasized that as the new millennium approaches, the world is going to become more dependent on spirituality.

"What you used to get away with, you're not going to get away with anymore," Vanzant said. "Things are changing."

"We have been educated and conditioned and programmed to be authenticated on the outside. But it is what you are on the inside that makes what you are on the outside," she continued. "The things that we used to do are not going to work anymore."

She also spoke about honesty and responsibility.

"We must tell the truth, first to ourselves about ourselves," Vanzant said.

"Find your culpability, responsibility and accountability in every situation."

"As we move closer to the new millennium, you must find the courage to do the things you need to do before you are told to do it," she continued.

Vanzant also spoke about what it takes to be successful.

"The main law of success is putting your butt on the line. Take a risk," she said.

"As we're moving into the new millennium, it's not a group movement, it's an individual enlightenment," she continued.

After her presentation, Vanzant took questions from the audience. One question was about simplicity.

"One of the reasons ore lives aren't simplified is because we're not conscious of what we have," Vanzant said. "Learn how to use what you have to its fullest advantage."

Audience members also asked about what it takes to achieve a purpose in life.

"If you know what you're good at, what you love to do, and how (that) can serve humanity, then you have a purpose," Vanzant said.

Audience members were very impressed by what Vanzant had to say.

"It was very inspirational," said Demetria Frank, a first-year political science student. "She touched upon a lot of issues I had in mind. Her whole speech was poetic."

Another audience member wished that more people would be able to hear Vanzant speak.

"I think she is a very powerful woman," said Audrey Lassiter, an administrative assistant in the Graduate School of Education and Information Studies. "I wish that more people would listen to her speak. If they listened to her just once, it would make a big difference in their lives."

The speech was co-sponsored by the UCLA Alumni Association.

Council seeks to extend Suharto's reign

INDONESIA: President receives nomination for seventh five-year term

By Geoff Spencer
The Associated Press

JAKARTA, Indonesia – International bankers are worried, but Indonesia's legislators have no doubts: President Suharto is the best man to lead the world's fourth-most populous country into the 21st century.

Delegations from all five factions in a 1,000-member assembly formally asked Suharto on Sunday to stand for election this week for a seventh five-year term.

Asia's longest-serving leader accepted each group's nomination during a series of reverential meetings at his suburban Jakarta home, just two days after new doubts were raised about the progress of an International Monetary Fund (IMF) bailout for Indonesia's battered economy.

"I am ready to accept this nomination, and with all my ability I will lead the nation to overcome this crisis," one faction leader quoted Suharto as saying.

Despite the deep economic crisis and outbreaks of civil unrest, Suharto has no challengers in Tuesday's voting by the partly elected, partly appointed assembly, which acts as a presidential electoral college.

Assembly delegates also have chosen to overlook his age – 76 – and earlier concerns about his health.

Infused with Suharto family members and friends, as well as serving and retired military officers, the assembly meets every five years under a tightly controlled political system created by Suharto.

The factions, which represent three officially recognized political parties as well as the military and regional interests, are also poised to grant Suharto new wide-ranging emergency powers to deal with the economic mess.

Suharto took control over Indonesia during a period of political upheaval in the 1960s and used emergency powers to outlaw Indonesia's communist party, which he accused of staging an abortive coup. He last had the special authority in 1988.

"He is a great leader who has successfully united this big country," Amir Santoso, a professor at the University of Indonesia, was quoted as saying by Sunday's Jakarta Post.

Suharto's dominance of Indonesian politics has remained intact despite the worst economic crisis in more than three decades. A 70-percent plunge in the value of the rupiah has dramatically forced up inflation and unemployment.

Riots over rising prices shook more than 20 cities last month and dozens of student protests have called for economic and political reform, including Suharto's resignation.

More troubling, though, is a decision by the IMF on Friday to delay a scheduled second installment of a $43 billion economic bailout.

The $3 billion installment, which had been due this month, won't be paid until at least April, amid fears that Indonesia is not vigorously implementing reforms agreed to under the rescue plan struck in January.

The IMF, the United States and other industrialized countries have repeatedly urged Suharto to carry through reforms that end monopolies and cartels, fix the ailing banking system, abolish subsidies and wind down costly projects.

The IMF is expected to wait

Tobacco industry to face tough legislation with hefty penalties

CONGRESS: Latest plan proposed would limit civil liability protection

By Richard Kell
Bloomberg News

WASHINGTON – Two U.S. senators – one Democrat and one Republican – are putting the finishing touches on tobacco legislation that would cost cigarette makers $620 billion over 25 years, according to a summary of the bill.

The legislation, drafted by Sens. John Chafee, R-R.I., and Tom Harkin, D-Iowa, would raise cigarette prices by $1.50 per pack in two years, give the Food and Drug Administration full authority to regulate nicotine, impose stiff penalties if teenage smoking doesn't decline, and put caps on annual liability payments without protecting tobacco companies from class action lawsuits.

The legislation, which is being closely watched because it is the first bipartisan proposal, would be far tougher on the industry than the $368.5 billion settlement negotiated with the states last June.

"At the end of the day, the legislation ultimately will include fewer civil liability protections and a greater annual cap on damages than what the industry was looking for," said Salomon Smith Barney tobacco analyst Martin Feldman. "There is now momentum to pass legislation, but the question is whether the industry can live with it."

Industry spokesmen did not immediately return calls seeking comment on the Chafee-Harkin bill, but in the past they have said that they would drop their support for legislation – and their willingness to restrict advertising – unless the tobacco companies are shielded from future class-action lawsuits.

Under the proposed June 20 settlement, the major tobacco companies would pay $368.5 billion over 25 years, accept FDA regulation and voluntarily restrict advertising and marketing. In return, they would get a ban on class action lawsuits, a ban on punitive damages in lawsuits, and a cap on annual payments for all other damages. The cap would start at $2 billion and rise to $5 billion in the ninth year.

The Chafee-Harkin bill, which is also backed by Sen. Bob Graham, D-Fla., would make the companies pay about $10 billion more in each of the 25 years and would include no ban on either class action suits or punitive damages. It would, however, cap

U.S. opposes inspections appointee

MIDEAST: Iraq questions American opposition to Russian-led inspections

By Wael Faleh
The Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq – Iraq criticized the United States on Sunday for opposing the appointment of a Russian as deputy chief of U.N. weapons inspectors, saying this proved the Americans wanted to dominate inspection operations.

The statement on the official Iraqi News Agency (INA) came as U.N. officials said Scott Ritter, an American once blocked from working by Iraq, has led an inspection team on visits to six sites the Iraqis consider "sensitive."

Ritter's visits were seen as a test of Baghdad's pledge last month to U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan to cooperate with the U.N. inspectors trying to certify that Iraq has destroyed its weapons of mass destruction.

Ritter's team inspected four sites on Sunday, INA said. It gave no details on their locations.

The news agency said the team was still at the fourth site 11 and a half hours after it left U.N. headquarters and was expected to remain "until a late hour of the night."

Ritter's team spent 10 hours inspecting sites on Friday and Saturday.

Last week, Russia requested that Annan appoint a Russian deputy to Richard Butler, head of the U.N. Special Commission that oversees the inspections. Such a move would give Russia, a strong supporter of Iraq, a hand in managing the inspection program.

The U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, Bill Richardson, told CNBC on Friday that "we are not very crazy" about the idea of adding a Russian deputy.

Albright leads proactive attempt to save Kosovo

WAR: Leaders meet with hopes of staving off more ethnic violence in Bosnia

By George Gedda
The Associated Press

PARIS – On a swing through Europe, Secretary of State Madeleine Albright warned Sunday that the conflict in Serbia's Kosovo province could spread elsewhere in the Balkans. She exchanged ideas with German and French leaders on how to stop the fighting before it does do just that.

Among proposals she discussed, on the eve of an international conference in London on the embattled province, were extension of a U.N. peacekeeping force in Macedonia, bordering Serbia, and expansion of a West European force based in next-door Albania.

In Bonn, after a meeting with Albright, German Foreign Minister Klaus Kinkel expressed alarm about the conflict and asserted that the world "cannot afford another awful conflagration in Europe."

Albright flew to Paris after a brief stay in Bonn and met in the French capital with Foreign Minister Hubert Vedrine. He said "urgent measures" are necessary to bring calm to Kosovo but offered no specifics and said his meeting with Albright produced no conclusions.

The secretary of state's day began in Rome and ended in London after the intermediate stops. Others expected at Monday's meeting in the British capital were Kinkel, Vedrine and diplomatic leaders from Britain, Italy and Russia.

On Thursday, the Clinton administration blamed Serbia for the unrest and withdrew several modest concessions offered to Belgrade just last month as a reward for positive steps it had taken in support of the Bosnian peace process.

In a similar vein, an administration official traveling with Albright said European participants in the London meeting would discuss cutting back assistance programs to Serbia and other measures.

On a separate track, the London meeting also was intended to seek ways to encourage a dialogue among the interested parties to the conflict, especially the Serbs and the Kosovo Albanians.

Albright's European travels, starting with Friday's visit to Italy, were designed originally to consult on the Iraq situation. The Kosovo crisis overshadowed the Middle East, however, as the death toll mounted in the province along with fears of a wider war.

Appearing with Kinkel, Albright said "dialogue and reconciliation" are needed between the Serb government in Belgrade and the rebellious Albanian majority in Kosovo. In recent days, the administration has hinted at the possibility of military action to end the fighting.

Film documents violent uprising in Chiapas

MEXICO: Emmy-Award-winning filmmaker Landau helps teach students about roots, history of conflict

By Claudia Flores
Daily Bruin Contributor

While we here in the United States enjoy the freedoms granted by our government, citizens in Mexico go deep into the jungles of Chiapas and seek new living space as they are pushed off their land.

Last Thursday, the Chicana/o Studies Research Center sponsored the presentation of the new film by Saul Landau, "The Sixth Sun: Mayan Uprisings in Chiapas," and the discussion of recent events at Acteal.

After the film presentation, Landau, an Emmy-Award-winning filmmaker and educator from California State University, Pomona, led a discussion on the current situation in Chiapas and how it is important to students here at UCLA.

"It is easy to not understand the connection between our place in the university and the occurrences in Chiapas," said Hugo Maldonado, Movimiento Estudiantil Chicana/Chicano de Aztlan (MEChA) chair.

"But we cannot lose sight of the fact that the people living through those violent, rebellious times are human beings ... our people," he added.

The film covered the uprising of the Zapatista Army in Chiapas led by Subcommander Marcos. The army is made up of men as well as women subcommanders, also interviewed in the film.

This revolution resulted partly from the changes ex-President Carlos Salinas de Gortari made in 1992 on

Israelis urge Netanyahu to choose peace

JERUSALEM – More than 1,500 reserve army officers and soldiers urged Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu on Sunday to choose peace with the Palestinians over settlements in the West Bank.

"A government that prefers maintaining settlements ... will arouse doubts in our hearts about the justice of our course," the reservists said in a full-page advertisement published in the Yediot Ahronot newspaper.

Among the 1,554 signatories were a former chief of the general staff, 11 major-generals and more than 200 officers with the rank of lieutenant-colonel or higher.

The prime minister's office said it had not received a copy of the letter and had no immediate response.

"The Palestinian areas are like a powder-keg," said Naftali Raz, a former sergeant in the paratroops who helped organize the campaign.

"All the experts agree that if the government goes on expanding settlements another intefadeh (Palestinian uprising) will break out, but this time it will be war."

Tran awarded medal for An Loc defense

LONG BEACH – Former Gen. Nhut Van Tran, who rallied his South Vietnamese troops to defend a crucial capital in the closing years of the Vietnam War, was awarded the U.S. Legion of Merit.

Retired Gen. William Westmoreland pinned the medal on his old ally aboard the Queen Mary at a ceremony Saturday night.

The Army years ago lost Tran's original nominating papers. The award was finally approved last month after retired Army Lt. Gen. Walter F. Ulmer resubmitted his name.

Tran, 62, immigrated to America in 1975. He has also received two Silver Stars, two Bronze Stars and an Army Commendation Medal.

Outnumbered, Tran's troops in 1972 held off three North Vietnamese Army divisions for 40 days.

The attack was part of a communist offensive aimed at final takeover. It could have ended the war in 1972 instead of 1975.

Most U.S. ground troops had been withdrawn, and the fighting tested Washington's "Vietnamization" program of providing air support only. U.S. planes turned the tide at An Loc, but Tran's troops showed they could hold their own against North Vietnamese regulars.

Spring break court promises quick justice

PANAMA CITY BEACH, Fla. – Spring Break Court is now in session.

Vacationing college students nabbed for misdemeanors like underage drinking and disorderly conduct can expect some immediate justice at this popular spring break destination. And they can avoid a criminal record by giving up a day at the beach for a day cleaning up the beach.

Starting Monday, instead of processing offenders through normal criminal channels, Bay County judges will hold court at City Hall in this Florida Panhandle resort town.

First-time offenders can keep their records clean by doing up to eight hours of community service cleaning beaches, parks and roadways.

Other options are pleading guilty and paying a $175 fine or pleading innocent and having to return for trial. The community service option has an advantage for young offenders.

"If they choose that then they don't have a record" Police Chief J.B. Holloway said. "Mom and Daddy don't have to know about it."

"As soon as you leave that courtroom you step onto a work van," Holloway said.

Lockdowns to abate violence do not erase racial tensions

PRISONS: Inmates say guards set up brawls by mixing gang members

By Steve Geissinger
The Associated Press

SUSANVILLE, Calif. – Convicted murderer Robert George is shouting through the crack of his solid cell door. There is venom in his eyes.

George, his short, trim figure visible through a glass window, is locked in here nearly around the clock since two racial brawls broke out in recent months. Guards shot and killed two prisoners – one in each of the clashes.

Here at High Desert State Prison, one of California's newest and most violent prisons, tensions are high between the different races and the gangs that run largely along racial lines.

Fights happen, but it's worse now that a federal grand jury investigating another prison has accused guards of intentionally setting the prisoners up for gladiator-like fights – putting known enemies together in the yard.

In the wake of the High Desert melees, scores of inmates are on lockdown in an attempt to thwart acts of revenge and give officials time to investigate. Inmates say the lockdowns just build frustration and anger.

Outside George's cell, guards tense. They warn a reporter pressing his ear against the crack of the door to hear George to back off if George starts spewing racial epithets – there are inmates of many races wandering freely in the high-security blockhouse and they don't want trouble.

George makes no slurs. Instead, he blames prison officials for the recent deaths. Since the prison opened in late 1995, six inmates have died violent deaths here.

"The last time I saw this (much racial violence) was in the 1980s in San Quentin," said A.C. Liggins, a 43-year-old burglar.

"We didn't have racial violence here but it was brought to a head" by prison policies, George says. "It seems more and more buttons are being pushed up and down the state by the administration, Sacramento, headquarters."

Among the policies: purposely mixing up the different races and gangs to diffuse tensions. The policy sometimes backfires when the numbers tip to one side or the other, leaving one group greatly outnumbered.

High Desert, 150 miles northeast of Sacramento, is so plagued by racial strife that the death toll of two inmates in 1996 – the first full year of its operation – was higher than at any other state prison.

Corrections Department officials are dealing with serious racial problems at two other high-security prisons: Pelican Bay State Prison, in the far northwestern corner of the state, and at Corcoran State Prison in the San Joaquin Valley.

There have been two deaths this year at Pelican Bay, both linked indirectly to gang affiliation. A county prosecutor has asked for a federal investigation into whether guards failed to protect an inmate who had implicated gang members in slayings.

The federal grand jury accused eight guards at Corcoran of pitting the inmates in deadly fights for the guards' amusement.

"At this point, to draw any connection (between allegations at the three prisons) would be premature," said Corrections Department spokeswoman Kati Corsaut.

"We're looking into allegations at Pelican Bay and investigating the incidents at High Desert. ... Should we find anything that would suggest (staff wrongdoing), we would look into it," Corsaut said.

The state has left the investigation of the Corcoran case to federal authorities, at their request, she said.

High Desert, Pelican Bay and Corcoran house some of the state's most dangerous – and famous – criminals, including Charles Manson and Sirhan Sirhan. But violence isn't uncommon at other state prisons.

The Associated Press

Inmates at the remote High Desert State Prison in Susanville, Calif., relax around a table while others play basketball in an outdoor yard. Outdoor yards have been the site of racial clashes between rival factions at the prison, which is one of the state's newest and most violent correctional facilities.

In the 29 badly-overcrowded state prisons for men, more inmates died violently in 1997 than at any time in more than a decade, according to statistics compiled by The Associated Press. Sixteen prisoners died at seven prisons, the highest toll since 19 deaths in 1987.

Prison officials argue that the 1997 death toll, when compared against the increasing prison population, shows the death rate has dropped significantly. Official 1997 figures and death rates will be released later this year.

Since High Desert opened in late 1995, there have been at least five racial melees.

In the most recent one, 10 Asian inmates attacked eight Hispanic prisoners in an exercise yard on Feb. 4. The guards shot into the crowd to break it up, killing one inmate and wounding two others.

On Dec. 26, 1997, in another exercise yard, at least 40 white inmates attacked 10 black prisoners – one of them in a wheelchair. Guards shot and killed one inmate. At least five other inmates were injured, some of them from bullet fragments.

As a result of the brawls, there is usually some kind of lockdown at the prison, which houses about 4,000 men.

George, 47, is serving a life sentence without the possibility of parole. He and some of the other seven inmates interviewed say they're upset about new grooming standards – short haircuts, no beards or big mustaches or Hitler-like mustaches. The regulations, touted as a security measure by officials, build tension and contribute to violence, the inmates say.

Other inmates accuse officials of mishandling racial problems.

Article 27 of the Mexican Constitution, which ended the land redistribution policy for the indigenous, argued political prisoner Javier Elorriaga in the film.

Today, the Zapatista Army is fighting against the changes Salinas de Gortari made, seeking redistribution of land owned by cattle ranchers in Chiapas.

According to the film, in the 1930s ex-President Cadenas enforced the national Indian policy which distributed the land that Zapata had promised to the indigenous people, even though it was opposed by land-owning elites.

"Cardenas distributed millions of acres of ejido land and told every peasant, 'Here is your rifle and you can protect your land and your school with this rifle,'" Landau said.

"Up until 1992, many groups of Mexicans could take over any plot of land that was not being utilized, claim it as theirs and begin to farm it," he added.

According to Landau, current President Ernesto Zedillo Ponce de Leon does not know what to do with the changes Gortari has left.

If Zedillo supports the Chiapanecos who are being pushed off of their land, then "how do you deal with cattlemen (landowners) in Chiapas who are hooked into the state Partido Revolucionario Institucional (PRI)?" Landau asked.

As a result of what has happened in Chiapas, "Mexico is no longer a coherent entity, but rather becomes a very disorganized governing class," Landau said.

In the 1994 elections, an unprecedented number of Chiapanecos voted but the PRI still won. These were signs to the indigenous that nothing in Chiapas would change for its people.

The film echoed many slogans of despair which reflected the feelings of the rebels, such as "If life is land, then we are the living dead."

The uprisings which have taken place these past few years in Chiapas have been supported by Bishop of Chiapas Samuel Ruiz, who has used allusions to the Bible such as "liberation comes from the poor," to show his support.

As a result of the support which Ruiz contributed, he was negatively recognized as responsible for promoting the revolution.

"The best thing we can do here is pressure our president to do something on behalf of the Zapatista Army. I guess that would be that activist approach here in the United States," Landau said.

"If we don't use our privileged position here at UCLA to assist those people, our people, that are struggling in Chiapas, then what are we doing in the university other than becoming those same forces that are keeping these people oppressed?" Maldonado added.

Guillermo Hernandez, director of the center, agreed.

"The massacre of approximately 45 people that recently took place in Acteal, Chiapas affects everyone. That was an extremely shocking crime, and all those people who have a conscience must listen," Hernandez said.

The film ended with Marcos explaining that they were not terrorists, saying they are not a threat to the Mexican or U.S. government.

"Our guns are just to say 'Here we are,'" Marcos said.

"My message to the American people is don't help the Mexican government. Help the Mexican people," he added.

assault with a deadly weapon, said officials bungled in December by allowing a large group of whites into the exercise yard with a small number of blacks.

"That, in itself, was a setup," Monroy said. "But not only the blacks got set up, the whites also got set up to be targeted by the gunner, and to justify it by saying that they (guards) had to in order to prevent the whites from killing the blacks."

High Desert officials say there was no intentional act.

"Whites retaliated, attacking the blacks that were available, even though there was no prior conflict between those inmates," High Desert spokesman Paul Edwards said.

The whites were angry that three African American prisoners had attacked a white inmate the month before, he said. The African Americans from the earlier incident, however, weren't in the yard because they were on lockdown.

Ask Michael Young, an African American man serving time for burglary, to explain the violence: "If you hit one, we hit two; if you hit two, we hit three."

The February clash also happened after an earlier, smaller fight. Edwards said the two factions had agreed to end tensions, even signing documents, before they were let out on the yard together.

Prison officials said they do everything they can to avoid racial violence in prisons. But total segregation – suggested by some inmates – is no answer, they said.

"We as a society are integrated. If these people are going back to society, they have to be able to live with other groups," Corrections Department spokeswoman Christine May said.

The racial violence inside High Desert's walls is a reflection of their outside lives: about half the inmates belong to street gangs who, once inside, teamed up with broader racial factions, officials said.

That affiliation determines everything in an inmate's life: even where to stand in an exercise yard and when to use the phone, prisoners say.

"It affects all of prison life," said Robert Ho, a Hawaiian who has affiliated with Latinos while serving time for grand theft auto. "Whatever color you are, that's the family you're going to run with."

"It's kind of weird," said Pablo Ramirez, a Latino serving time for carjacking and robbery. "Even though I'm not racist, you come here and you have to pay attention to race. You associate with your own race. If it comes to my race, I'm going to jump because I've got to survive in here."

primarily a white woman's disease.

"So, many Asian American women don't go in for mammograms," Kagawa-Singer said. "It's already a problem now. But it will become a more significant problem in just a short time."

Another issue the new program hopes to address is a better representation of all the Asian populations in America.

According to Kagawa-Singer, there are about 60 different Asian groups currently living in America.

Most, if not all, of these groups tend to get left out of medical surveys because the surveys don't translate into the languages that many immigrants speak. The smaller Asian groups, such as the Thai, Cambodian and Samoan populations, especially suffer from such misrepresentation.

The language barrier also presents another problem. Medical brochures and informational packets don't reach these populations because many of them are written only in Spanish and not many Asian languages, Kagawa-Singer explained.

"There's just such a lack of communication because of the language and cultural barriers," agreed France Nguyen, a first-year graduate student in the School of Public Health. Nguyen plans to apply to the Asian American studies program so that she can participate in the concurrent degree program next fall.

"(Medical professionals) need to be exposed to such cultural understandings," Nguyen added. "They don't have to be Asian. They just have to understand."

The new program has been receiving positive acceptance from both faculty and students.

"The idea (of the program) has been around for a long time," Fan said.

"But the needs of the communities, growing student interest and enthusiastic faculty really helped get it going."

This program is just one of many other concurrent programs the Asian American studies program hopes to create.

"We're anticipating a series of other joint-degree programs. We're forging links between Asian American studies and professional fields such as social welfare, urban planning, and law. It offers something very practical for our students."

WESTWOOD

counselor for the Village Center Westwood. Abshez filled in for Ira Smedra, the developer of the project, who could not attend the forum.

Abshez described the project, noting first the five-acre parcel of land just south of Macy's that they expect to build the project on. Also in the works are 1,650 subterranean parking spaces, which project leaders believe will address the problem of parking, the No. 1 complaint about Westwood.

The Village Center Westwood will donate 12,000 square feet of the project for a public library, accompanied by 150,000 square feet of retail space and 26,000 square feet for restaurants and theaters. A supermarket and drug store are also in the plans.

"We want to build an anchor role in the village," Abshez said. "We want to get people back in the habit of coming to Westwood again."

The third speaker, Doug Brown, gave the features of Regent Properties' project, planned for the east side of the village, on Gayley.

Though smaller than the Village Center Westwood, the Westwood Marketplace will provide a few of the same services, including movie theaters and retail space.

From the 130,000 square-foot project, 60,000 of those square feet will be designated as an urban village with an outdoor environment, to be built in a colonial mediterranean style.

Brown mentioned that when developments have been planned for places like Glendale or Hollywood, the idea is always to build a Westwood village.

"So where better to build a Westwood Village than in Westwood?" he asked.

Opposed to both projects is Larry Taylor, the single largest property owner in the village, after acquiring over $50 million in property.

"Westwood is not looking to be redeveloped. It is already developed," he stated at the beginning of his speech.

Now, as Westwood is sandwiched between UCLA to the north and high rises to the south, he attributes the decline experienced over the years to a lack of concern, talent and design. Taylor would like to rehabilitate what is already here, instead of starting over and building more structures.

"Why don't we take what is there and restore, rebuild and revitalize?"

he suggested. "The 200,000 square feet of buildings existing will provide a wonderful catalyst for restoration."

He believes less is more and relayed his disapproval of Smedra's Village Center Westwood, calling some of its components stupid, short-sighted and basically a bad idea.

Jeffrey Lewine, president and CEO of Mann Theaters, is interested in restoring the Bruin and the Village Theaters and allowing for an improved Westwood Village experience.

As a newcomer to Westwood, Lewine has detected the passion for Westwood that so many people possess. He sees that these people have different visions for Westwood, but believes that all of these same people have one thing in common: brains.

With this combination the "sea of Westwood should rise and should rise for all of us," he said.

He finished his speech by ending any rumor that Mann Theaters is leaving Westwood, insisting that they were not leaving, have never left, and do not plan to ever leave the village.

Questions ranged over a variety of topics. One attendee questioned Westwood's ability to change with the times in order to preserve its vitality.

He was quickly answered by Jackie Freedman, co-president of the Holmby Westwood Homeowners' Association. She insisted that Westwood has plenty of space to grow and change within the Westwood Specific Plan. She also suggested that if the plan is going to change then an overall comprehensive look should be taken.

Suspicions that the university is quietly creeping into the village surfaced.

Blackman assured him that UCLA's agenda is currently focused on retrofitting buildings and not taking over Westwood. UCLA would like to acquire more office space in Westwood, which is no different than many other businesses in the area.

One question addressed the 30-foot sunken plaza in the Village Center Westwood. An example was requested of a sunken plaza that has worked.

Abshez could not give an example of a lucrative sunken plaza but believes it will work as an attractive space with a unique design.

One community member suggested that Smedra consider building the Nansay Project instead of his Village Center Westwood. The final entitlement for this project was completely approved in March of 1993 and remains within the requirements of the Westwood Specific Plan.

This project consists of a hotel, high-end retail space, commercial and office space and 24 condos.

Unlike the Village Center Westwood, it would not require the vacation of Glendon Avenue, a big concern for many Westwood residents.

Finally, Lewine told the forum that Mann Theaters is about to announce their interest in a Kodak fantasy theater, which would be an exhibition of new technology.

Outside of all the exciting plans that hope to revitalize Westwood, Lewine recommends that everyone needs to come together in a consensus first.

"People are going to stop wanting to hear about it and you'll never have a consensus," he said.

liability payments at $4 billion a year. An additional $4 billion a year would also be available to pay off claims, but that money would be drawn from the annual industry payments and would not change the overall cost.

The bill calls for raising the price of a pack of cigarettes by $1 in the first year of the agreement and another 50 cents in the second year. Tobacco companies would have to sign consent decrees guaranteeing they would pass through the price increase to retailers.

Tobacco companies also would face stiff penalties if teen smoking rates don't decline by set amounts, reaching a 65 percent reduction level in the 10th year.

In the first two years of the agreement, the industry would pay two cents for each pack sold if the goals aren't met; in years three and four, the amount doubles to four cents per pack. From year five forward, the industry-wide amount would be six cents per pack. In addition, the companies themselves would face additional penalties – as yet undetermined – if the reduction rates aren't reached.

None of these payments would be tax deductible, the aides said.

The new legislative proposal builds on last year's historic $368.5 billion tobacco agreement by requiring the industry to pay for smoking-cessation programs and fund cancer research, as well as abandoning a host of marketing and advertising restrictions.

In addition, cigarette companies would be required to fully disclose all ingredients they include in their cigarettes.

Chafee and Harkin have been working on their plan with the encouragement of Republican and Democratic Senate leaders and the Clinton administration. Theirs, though, is just one of several proposals that will be, or have been, offered.

Most Senate Democrats have endorsed a bill by Sen. Kent Conrad, a North Dakota Democrat, which would cost the industry $600 billion and provide no protection from lawsuits.

The Republican leadership has asked Sen. John McCain, an Arizona Republican who heads the Commerce Committee, to draft legislation that tries to bridge the gap between all of the major participants.

PARKING

for drivers who transport disabled drivers.

"The law requires that a person who is transporting a disabled person, which they are perfectly legally able to do, must park within reasonable proximity of the disabled person's destination," Rand said.

Therefore, drivers are not permitted to drop off a disabled person at one destination and then use the placard to park in a location that is not near the disabled person.

UCLA parking enforcement has seen an increase in the number of complaints from disabled drivers unable to find parking. He said that the Dixon Court parking area, which runs throughout most of central campus, has seen the most complaints.

"I have encountered difficulty finding a parking space at times. I can see how the convenience would appeal to those who use our placards, but it is truly inconsiderate that healthy people would take advantage of the benefits offered to us," said one disabled driver, who wished to remain anonymous.

According to Rand, well over 100 citations have been issued for misuse of placards since the initiation of this program. He added, however, that the rate of abuse has been declining.

"We have absolutely no intention of stopping this program. I understand it's difficult for people to find parking on this campus," Rand said. "But there is absolutely no excuse, in my mind, for using a disabled person's parking placard, if you're not disabled yourself."

until Suharto selects a new Cabinet next month before releasing any more funds to Indonesia.

It has also cautioned Suharto not to proceed with a plan to peg the rupiah to the U.S. dollar, saying the move could have disastrous economic effects.

Financial markets are unsure about Suharto's intentions.

Last week Suharto said that while he was committed to carrying out IMF reforms, they had not delivered economic benefits and more needed to be done.

At the end of one meeting on Sunday, one faction leader from the minority Muslim-oriented United Development Party quoted Suharto as saying the IMF rescue deal "did not suit the spirit" of Indonesia's constitution, which called for a cooperative rather than a liberal economy.

Suharto did not talk to reporters and presidential officials were not available for comment.

INSPECTIONS

Iraq's response came Sunday in a statement, attributed to the political editor of state-run Radio Baghdad, carried by the Iraqi News Agency.

The editor, who was not identified, accused the United States of "insisting on keeping the imbalanced composition" of the inspection teams, "giving priority to the presence of American members," the news agency said.

This, the editor said, was aimed at using "the Special Commission and its activities as a tool to serve their political and espionage activities."

The commentary said the Americans aimed to keep the inspectors moving "in never-ending circles" to prolong their work – and trade sanctions imposed after Iraq invaded Kuwait in 1990, leading to the Persian Gulf War.

The Security Council has said it will not lift the sanctions until the inspectors certify that Iraq has destroyed its biological, chemical and nuclear weapons as well as long-range missiles.

U.N. spokesman Alan Dacey said Ritter's team visited the six "sensitive" sites Friday and Saturday and his team "received the full cooperation of the Iraqi authorities."

So-called sensitive sites include ministries and headquarters of intelligence or military operations, and U.N. teams generally are accompanied by senior Iraqi officials.

Ritter is here with 50 inspectors – one of the largest teams ever sent to Iraq – and is expected to spend a week in the country. The teams include inspectors from at least 11 countries, including 12 Americans.

In January, Iraq had accused Ritter of being a spy and said that his team included too many American and British inspectors. They refused to give him Iraqi escorts, preventing him from working.

Since then, the U.N. secretary-general has traveled to Iraq to work out a deal on easing the inspectors' way.

Under the agreement signed Feb. 23, Iraq is committed to facilitating inspections. The deal also set up a system for inspecting eight presidential compounds by a special committee that includes U.N. diplomats.

Jayantha Dhanapala, a former Sri Lankan ambassador to the United States, whom Annan has named to head the special committee, was expected to arrive on his first visit to Iraq on Wednesday.

ALBRIGHT

The skies over Europe were alternately cloudy and clear as Albright proceeded with her hopscotch tour of four countries. The mixed weather patterns mirrored the lack of consensus among participants in Monday's talks.

Russia is seen as the most reluctant of the six to recommend decisive action, having described the situation in Kosovo as an internal matter. France and Italy also are seen as cautious.

Kinkel's alarm over the situation was based partly on his government's worry that another wave of refugees could be flushed out of the Balkans and descend onto German soil. Early in the decade, hundreds of thousands of Bosnians fled warfare in that country, many winding up in Germany.

Albright believes lack of an international response to the Bosnian conflict helped fuel the bloody strife there. She worries that a similar turn of events could occur in Kosovo if Belgrade is not pressured to back down. The United States and Italy, among others, support restoration of the autonomy Kosovo had until a decade ago when Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic withdrew it.

Over the past week, more than 50 people have died, all but a few of them members of Kosovo's Albanian population.

In a Sunday television interview in the United States, U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan seemed to endorse keeping the U.N. force in Macedonia, led by an American contingent, past its cutoff date this summer. "I am confident that the member states will take a second look and not insist on withdrawing the troops from Macedonia," Annan said.

Albright was noncommittal in Europe about the possibility. She said the mission has performed a useful role and believes it should continue to do so.

More than 900 U.N. peacekeepers are stationed in Macedonia, of which some 350 are Americans. Their mandate expires Aug. 31 but some countries believe an extension is warranted because of the renewed fighting in Kosovo.

MURPHY

While these things do add more stress to student life, some feel that the employees are unsympathetic to their problems. Until a year and a half ago, Judy Cervantes, a third-year English student, also had this complaint.

Cervantes, currently a student worker in the Main Cashier's Office, now knows what it is like to live on both sides of the glass windows. She now realizes why the employees sometime become frustrated when there are so many students who don't know the answer to even basic questions.

Many students do not even realize that they are supposed to be getting a bill every month, a bill that is due on the 20th. If they are not they need to check if their address is correct. When registration comes around there are hour long lines because people miss the deadline, completely oblivious to that when a bill should be coming. Cervantes advises students to listen to URSA.

Going to Murphy Hall does not need to be a grueling experience. When making a trip there, students should keep in mind that the long lines are a result of those who do not pay their bill on time or wait until the last minute, the hassles are created from not being aware of basic information and the "rude" workers are mostly only trying to help students.

EDITORIAL

Bill makes service programs accessible

LEGISLATION: Financial compensation lets busy students get involved helping their communities

With students devoting so much time and energy to studying and holding jobs, community service often falls by the wayside. Due to this lackluster involvement in community service, Sen. Tom Hayden has written a bill to compensate those who donate their time to service. The bill is a long-overdue push for increasing community service.

Hayden's main objective is to increase student involvement in community service, especially tutoring. He written Senate Bill 1740 in order to motivate more students to donate time to community service projects.

Many college students work in order to pay tuition or other expenses, and thus are unable to dedicate any time to serving the community.

Hayden's bill promises to allow those interested in community service, but tied down by jobs, to dedicate some time to take part in projects such as tutoring or serving as mentors for younger students.

Hayden was the keynote speaker at last week's Community Service Conference at UCLA, which attracted only 122 people, 35 of whom were speakers. This dismal showing is indicative of the lack of student involvement or interest in community service, and demonstrates the need for a solution that will spark involvement.

Hayden attended the conference to promote his program and to raise student awareness about the importance of serving the community.

He was adamant about getting more college students involved in the community, saying that public universities have a responsibility of serving the public, and was hopeful that his program could provide the impetus for getting students to commit to more community-oriented activities.

Hayden's bill proposes to establish the Statewide Service Learning Center Program, which would formally train students to tutor younger students. If passed, the bill would also devote $25 million to establishing the program.

The funds would be allocated to campus community service centers which provide matching funds from non-state sources. The money would then go toward partially paying for those students' tuition costs.

Although critics may argue students should not be "paid" for volunteer work, Hayden's program merely provides an added incentive for students to help better the community through various projects.

Student participation in high school community service organizations is high, in part because club members have an incentive for their participation – a notation on their transcripts that indicates community service.

College students, who have less time to juggle more responsibilities, often find it much more difficult to dedicate time to such projects.

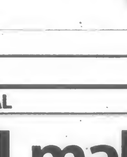
For those students who want to participate in community service projects but cannot because they have jobs, the financial compensation provides them with the means to get involved. The bill is not a means of coercion.

The bill represents a much-needed step toward getting more students involved in helping the community. There's certainly a need for students to devote more time to service programs, and Hayden's bill provides the incentive for students to do so.

Community service needs to be a priority for college students, and if students are given some compensation for their work, the community will benefit as well.

What UCLA can teach us

EDUCATION: Secrets of restful class participation, quarter system revealed



Justin Horey

25-0. Do you know what those numbers represent? No, they are not the first two numbers in the combination to Albert Carnesale's safe deposit box, and no, they do not represent the Bruins' record versus USC in football since 1973 (although I understand it's close). No, 25 is the total number of columns (including this one) that I have written for the Daily Bruin since fall quarter of 1996, and zero is the exact amount (in dollars) which I have been paid for my services over those five quarters. (Who, me? Bitter?) Why would I subject myself to such horrid treatment?

You guessed it – because I'm a narcissist and I love seeing that photo in the paper every other Monday. (That and the fact that I'm a psych major, so if it weren't for this column I would never use the word processor that was so graciously given to me as a high school graduation gift.)

In any case, you're welcome. You're all welcome for the months of faithful service. (But now it's over, so get on with your miserable little lives.)

Since this is my last ever Viewpoint column, I flirted with the idea of making it one big "farewell/passing-the-proverbial-Viewpoint-torch" column, but let's face it: with a nose like mine, you don't flirt with anything for long.

No, I have set aside nostalgia and sentimentalism one last time in order to bid an appropriate farewell to my post as a Viewpoint columnist. How will I do this, you ask? Read on, I answer. Why must I always begin my columns with rambling, point-free introductions, you inquire? Therapy, I respond. (Well, therapy, and it fills up column space which would otherwise be reserved for substantive material, which I am committed to keeping out of this paper.)

I promised to keep this column free of sentimentalism and I will be true to my word. However, I would be remiss if I passed up the opportunity to leave my mark with this last column. That is why I will leave you all with my own personal university retrospective: What I learned at UCLA. (It's kind of like a "Cliff's Notes" for life.) This column is dedicated to my mom, who always asked me, "What did you learn in school today?" (Forget that, Mom – here's what I learned in school my whole life.)

OK, so I was a psychology major. (What's it to you?)

Fortunately, at a large university like ours, we are all introduced to a wealth of topics and knowledge. That's why I have broken down my acquired knowledge by subject. Think you can follow that, kids? (Good.)

Economics: One of the most important lessons I learned at UCLA was in economics. The lesson? Quarters are life.

You need them to park, you need them to do laundry, you need them to live. Unfortunately, I've found that the best place to find these little tokens of joy is at the arcade. (Do you know of a better place? I didn't think so.) I have also heard that there is some sort of beverage consumption game that can be played using them, but I (of course) am uncertain of the truthfulness of that particular rumor.

Biology: Biology is one subject that has always scared me, so it's surprising to me that I am leaving UCLA with any knowledge of it at all. However, this lesson is one of the most important that I learned here. Say what you will about REM sleep; my time at UCLA has taught me that you never rest better than when you sleep in lecture. Sure, it's difficult to tune out your professors at first, but once you master the skill of incorporating their voice into your dreams, you're set for some easy sleepin'. (Note: if you happen to be taller than 5'6", select an aisle seat for maximum comfort. You run greater risk of being singled out by the professor when you're on the aisle, but it's definitely worth it to be able to stretch those legs. "Zzzz...")

Sociology: Now here's a subject that I can get excited about. You could easily spend four years waiting

See HOREY, page 19

Horey is a fourth-year psychology student, and we at Viewpoint don't know what we are going to do without him.

What is Generation X? Who are we? Unlike the Baby Boomers, we are not coming of age during a war or a "great social movement." What will history have to say about Generation X? "Why? I HATE Jerry Springer"

TALK SHOWS: Voyeurism in America has taken disturbing turn for worse

By Kevin Powell
University Wire

Believe me, I have tried mightily not to.

But there is no ignoring the fact that Jerry Springer's talk show is as potent as El Niño; so much so, remarkably, that wherever I go to a college campus for a lecture, to a gathering of professionals or even to my barbershop, more people than I am able to count are completely infatuated with the pandemonium that has come to define Springer's program.

Indeed, it has gotten so bad that Ghent Elementary School in Norfolk, Virginia, recently sent home notes with students suggesting to parents that they monitor their children's viewing habits a bit closer. It seems that several students have taken to imitating the screaming, the hair-pulling, the punching and the chair-throwing that are Springer's trademarks.

Once again we Americans have become addicted to the sensational (think O.J.) and logic has been replaced by the epicurean's need to be titillated, whatever the price of the ticket.

No matter. I think it is downright sad that a plethora of Americans either make their schedules around Springer, or set their VCRs to catch the latest battle royale. Not only do we sit there and inhale Springer, but long after the program is over, we mill about debating the topic of the day:

"Man, you can tell she was a he by her Adam's Apple."

"That ain't true! You gotta look at her feet."

"Later for that. She's ugly anyway. I wouldn't've even stepped to her in the first place."

That dialogue came in my barbershop, while watching a recent episode about men who did not know that their girlfriends were men. Anticipating this particular installment, my barbershop set up two TV sets to insure customers would not miss a thing! When the desired fight transpired, the roar was deafening and if I would have closed my eyes I could easily have sworn that I was at the Super Bowl. Or a pro-wrestling match.

But maybe that is it right there. Maybe we Americans are simply more voyeuristic than I ever thought and get a perverse satisfaction from observing other people's turbulent lives from a safe distance.

I mean, shucks, haven't I appeared on the first season of MTV's hugely popular docu-soap "The Real World?" And haven't six additional seasons of that show been produced this decade, plus a spin-off called "Road Rules?"

And haven't numerous college students, hip-hop heads, skateboarders and otherwise cool women and men, from all walks of life, come up to me asking, "How can I get on 'The Real World'?"

We have been reared on a culture which says, often and loudly, that the only way to be someone is to be someone who is seen. Now, thanks to the explosion of talk shows and cable TV, we have the opportunity to be seen as much as we want. And in any form or fash-

CRITICISM: Letters show myopic, academic view of essentially trivial event

By Juan Del Rio

I have chosen to respond to the Viewpoint "Letters" section on March 4, due to the incredible level of misdirected insensitivity that was displayed by Ms. Beazley and Mr. Danna. While I am sure that both writers are certainly bright, their inadequacies in observing the real point here has unfortunately led them to unfairly criticize the Daily Bruin.

You see, these two writers have obviously fallen prey to what I call the "hopeless victim of academia" syndrome (HVA). Countless professors, campus administrators and graduate students fall prey to this disease every day. When you're locked up in your little bubble on campus where you avoid the realities of the world and blow things out of proportion, you become a victim of this syndrome. Symptoms include what you have here – two people extremely locked into the pursuit of what is often informational bits of the most trivial nature. Sufferers of this syndrome also pride themselves on their never-ending quest for criticizing the smallest aspects of an even less important issue, (e.g. The Bruin's Feb. 26 headline "Albert Carnesale searching for No. 2 man"). But take heart, Beazley and Danna, there is room for people such as yourselves who like to take the time picking at such insignificant matters ... it's in academia. The two of you could be chairmen ... uh, excuse me, chairpersons ... of academic departments and further promote the 'big fish, small pond' mentality which currently affects the egos and behavior of everyone inside Murphy Hall, with the exception of our chancellor.

Should people such as yourselves be forced to associate with common people who, unlike us, cannot hide

Evidence lacking

I am responding to T. Richard Davis' Viewpoint article about Steve Lavin, the coach of the UCLA basketball team ("Lavin largely to blame for team woes," March 4). I was disappointed with the lack of evidence for the assertion that Lavin "has no clue what it takes to win." The fact is that I agree that Lavin is extremely overrated, yet your reasoning, Davis, exhibits your complete lack of basketball knowledge.

You claim that the Bruins of 1996-'97 made an "incredible run through a weak Pac-10 field." Did you neglect to do research or did you just forget Stanford, Cal, and Arizona? I'm guessing that you missed March Madness last year. Had you watched the tournament, you would have noticed very strong performances from our Pac-10 competitors.

Next you claim that the Bruins having higher shooting percentages than their victorious opponents means that the loss is the coach's fault. Do turnovers, free throws, three-point percentage or any of the game's non-statistical intangibles mean anything to you? You also critique the two wins against Arizona because you felt that they were too close. Last time I checked the Bruins were not playing horseshoes or hand grenades. This is basketball, where close doesn't count and margin of victory is irrelevant. The fact is that the Bruins defeated the eventual National Champions not once, but twice. Lastly, you felt compelled to include the infamous Jelani McCoy situaion we desire.

Not surprisingly, Jerry Springer is running neck and neck with Oprah because so many of us, I think, need excitement in our otherwise dull lives and because Springer's guests, in a twisted way, make us feel so much better.

One friend said to me it was "empowering" to know her life, compared to Springer's guests, just isn't that bad.

> I hate the fact that so few Springer viewers wonder if these "guests" are actors.

Yes, I do hate Jerry Springer's program and will continue to hate it until it is taken off the air for good. Yes, I do believe in free speech, but I do think all of us, when we step into a public arena, have to think responsibly about what we are doing, particularly when our actions affect so many.

Likewise, I hate the fact that so few Springer viewers wonder if these "guests" are actors; or acknowledge that these guests' self-esteems might be so low that a free limo ride, and whatever other trinkets are tossed at them, propel them to come on national TV and make complete fools of themselves.

But, then again, the Springer show is like that old tale of the people looking and laughing at the monkeys at the zoo. After a while, you begin to wonder who is really caged, and who is really getting the last laugh?

tion. You don't know the possible pressure Lavin faced, you did not notice the hustle of the five starters, and you definitely didn't watch McCoy's lackluster minutes.

If you had taken more time and contemplation you might have strengthened your article with some logical evidence. For instance, why did Lavin renegotiate an already lucrative contract for a couple extra hundred thousand? There are coaches who have been winning on this campus for years and still make a fraction of Lavin's salary. He was already making exponentially more money than he ever imagined in a job that he only assumed because of a number of odd twists of fate for the program. Looking at the team it is easy to see the effects of poor coaching. For instance, do you think that J.R. Henderson would be allowed to sulk on the court after every missed shot or foul an official called or failed to call if he played for Bobby Knight or Mike Krzyzewski? I don't think many of the Duke players, having picked up four fouls in four minutes of play, would have been smiling had we been beating them by 30 points. Would Rick Patino allow a point guard to foul out of nine games or even one for that matter? How many coaches are afraid to yell at their players when it is necessary? How many coaches congratulate their players after bonehead technical fouls and turnovers? How many coaches allow their players to walk slowly off the court during substitutions? How many coaches plan to play only six players? We have a group of undisciplined individuals and potential All-Americans, yet what UCLA lacks is a team. That is the coach's fault.

for a single "fact" studying sociology, so consider yourself blessed that I am including one here, free of charge. The sociological lesson that I learned during my stay in Westwood is that when you're with a large group of people, it's perfectly acceptable (in fact, you're encouraged) to yell, "Go home" or "Who's he?!" when someone's name is announced over a public address system. (Socialization at its finest, so? Thank you, UCLA!)

Political Science: OK, I'll be honest. Before I came to UCLA, I didn't have a clue what political science was. And OK, I still really don't know, but I would classify this next lesson as being of the poly-sci persuasion anyway. My years at UCLA have taught me that nothing in our world should ever go unprotested, and that the most important ingredient in a social protest is not anger or desire for reform or a charismatic leader. No, the most important ingredient in a protest is chalk for Bruin Walk. (That way, everyone who visits UCLA for years to come will know that you protested your cause Thursday at noon in Westwood Plaza.)

History: If I understand correctly, history is the study of the past. One thing that I learned about my past from UCLA is that nothing they teach you in high school has any use once you leave high school. Don't believe me? Try this simple test: go rent Billy Madison. Fast forward to the end, where Billy has the academic decathlon of high school knowledge with his nemesis Eric, and try to complete any of the tasks they face. Or try this: speak for more than 30 seconds in the foreign language you studied in high school. Define cosine? Sine? Even better, just try to name five teachers you had in high school. ("Um, there was Mr. Birken-something, and Mrs. Tress-or-other for English, I think...")

Journalism: Not surprisingly, I also learned an important lesson about journalism at UCLA. I learned that it's OK to mock other columnists in your column, but that it's unwise to mock one whose column runs the day after yours. Unfortunately, our buddy Michael Daugherty (whose column ran Friday) has not learned that lesson. Maybe Daniel Inlender has been forgiving, but I'm not. (Watch your back, Mike, I'm a lot tougher than I look in that picture.)

Lastly, there are two things that I've learned in the past 21 years outside of UCLA; you can file these under "Life". (Incidentally, I always try to end my columns with a joke. Sadly, this is not one of those times.) Two things I've learned ... I love my mom, and I love Jesus. (You should, too.) Thanks for reading, everybody.

under the shelter of the university, you would probably hear expressions such as "my right-hand man," or "my No. 2 man" for that matter. Such expressions date back to well before the time that your grandmother was born and, consequently, before this ridiculous obsession with degendering our language. Perhaps I should interject one of my favorite expressions: Idle hands are the playground of the devil. Hopefully the two of you will find activities to occupy yourselves in the near future. It might lead you to really put everything in perspective and hopefully realize that the little things such as these don't matter. To the rest of you reading, don't catch this virus. Enjoy the campus community but don't forget that it is a very large bubble that is damn near impenetrable sometimes. But we can't be in school forever – one day reality hits. It's just a matter of when and where.

ARTS & ENTERTAINMENT

Do not despair: Decent theater can be found in Los Angeles

COLUMN: Missed cues and blown fuses make live performance exciting

Sam Toussi

I've been writing for the Daily Bruin for almost a year now and I can say for certain that nobody who is not related to me has ever read one of my articles. I don't mind really, I don't. It's not like you'll see me on top of Royce Hall with an uzi anytime soon.

I understand that the articles I write (theater articles for the most part) are articles that fill up space and that nobody is interested in them. It's OK, I get to meet interesting people and see plays for free. I get to hear about my editor's thong and how it's riding up her ass. Sometimes, I get food after a show and they have booze and they don't card me. I drive home absolutely sloshed.

But I used to be in New York where theater is part of the mainstream. People not only care about it, they're proud of it. It's a nice feeling, especially when you are a theater-oriented person.

Here in Los Angeles, the movie industry rules and there are no real theater districts to be found. The closest people get to seeing live theater is getting a hold of that Tommy and Pamela Lee sex video.

And it's true, a lot of the plays I see for The Bruin aren't that good. In fact, they're actually pretty bad. I saw one where the lights blew out halfway through the second act and the audience had to sit in total darkness for 15 minutes. I saw one play where a professional actor actually called for a line during a show.

I saw one play called "Social Security" and it seemed as though most of the audience thought they were going to get their social security. I was the only one under the age of 90. You don't know how many times I heard one man say "What the hell are they talking about? I can't here a word. Speak up!" It was depressing. I could barely hear the actors over the sound of wheezing and IVs dripping.

And to be honest, I'm really tired of a lot of the theater in this city. A lot of the plays I see are about as interesting as watching chimps mate. Sure, it might be funny for a moment or two, but try watching it for two hours.

I'm tired of seeing movie actors trying to pay their rent by doing theater. It's obvious they don't have the love for live performing and they suck like the Spice Girls. Take that simile any way you like.

And I swear to God, if I have to see one more play about a struggling scriptwriter, I'm going to put a bullet through my head.

So I understand why most people

DIRECTOR RICHARD KWIETNIOWSKI EXPLAINS WHY CULTURAL, SEXUAL AND PHILOSOPHICAL DIVERSITY ARE KEYS TO FILMMAKING

Jason Priestley plays B-movie actor Ronnie Bostock, who is pursued by a reclusive author.

By Louise Chu
Daily Bruin Contributor

Watching him on the phone in the lobby of the Sunset Marquis Hotel, he seems so British. His mild manner, clean haircut and simple white-shirt, black-slacks-look only add to the illusion. Then comes the dead giveaway: his classic British accent. One would almost expect him to greet people with, "Care to join me for a spot of tea?" That is, until one hears what he has to say.

"I have a certain love-hate relationship with British culture and especially that superior, old-fashioned, very male type of 'we're-still-the-most-important-nation-in-the-world-and-we're-not-interested-in-anything-else,'" reveals Richard Kwietniowski, writer and director of "Love and Death on Long Island," which stars John Hurt ("Contact" and "Rob Roy") and Jason Priestly of "Beverly Hills 90210" fame.

The sentiment may largely be attributed to the influence of his father, who was a Polish immigrant to England. Although Kwietniowski was born and raised in London, he admits that having contrasting cultures during his upbringing caused this slightly detached attitude toward the British way of life.

"I still have no idea how you play cricket," Kwietniowski adds jokingly. "I was the only guy ever to have gone to my high school and not know how to play cricket. I was once asked by a teacher, 'Is your dad dead?' I said 'no.' 'Is your dad disabled?' 'No.' 'Why hasn't he taught you how to play cricket?'"

This attitude, along with his love of movies, is what brought him to write and direct his feature-film debut "Love and Death on Long Island." Being an avid movie fan naturally exposed him to the American film industry, which has historically dominated the world market. In watching American films, Kwietniowski discovered a preference for a genre of filmmaking that further solidified his culturally divergent views.

"One of the problems I have, being based in Britain, (is that) most British films are based either in the past or in a gritty realism, which is very socio-economic, so it's a diagnosis of the way certain people live," Kwietniowski explains. "I tend to come from a different, un-English tradition, which is more about people's interior lives and fantasy and desire."

The writer-director explores these aspects in "Love and Death," a film about a reclusive British writer named Giles De'Ath (Hurt), who falls obsessively in love with Ronnie Bostock (Priestly), an American heartthrob who stars in cheesy teen movies like "Hotpants College II." Giles eventually travels to Ronnie's Long Island home, befriends him and his fiancee (Fiona Loewi), and fills his head with dreams of a serious acting career in Europe.

Originally inspired by Gilbert Adair's novel of the same name, Kwietniowski also drew from aspects of Thomas Mann's novel "Death in Venice" and Vladimir Nabakov's "Lolita." Despite his many sources of inspiration, he found the writing process rather complicated, especially in expressing the complexity of the character Giles.

"One of the most difficult things for me about (Adair's) book was the fact that it was written in the first

SOUND BITES

Warner Brothers
MADONNA
"Ray of Light"

Madonna, "Ray of Light" (Maverick/ Warner) Perhaps one of the few female pop stars truly worthy of being called a "diva," Madonna teams up with producer William Orbit to throw us all an electronic curveball with "Ray of Light." At first, one must wonder if Madonna is jumping on the electronic-pop phenomenon with her loop-laden and uncharacteristically atmospheric new album. However, within seconds of first experiencing what is clearly her finest and most creative release to date, you know the former Material Girl has given us something new and exciting to fawn over.

All the tracks on "Ray of Light" sparkle, as keyboards, guitars and various computerized sounds float in and out of the speakers with a harmony not yet found amidst the electronic, hyped albums of the past couple of years.

Songs like "Skin" and "The Power of Goodbye" explore the potentials of synthesizers and computers, and yet they don't merely function as canvases for Orbit to show off. Instead, the musical soundscapes mix harmoniously with Madonna's singing and poetic proclamations.

Yet even the innovative music is eclipsed by the superstar herself. Madonna gives us her best vocal delivery and lyrical presentation yet. The title track, undoubtedly the standout song of the album, is a fantastic, innovative dance song that isn't too different from U2 and David Bowie's newer material, but its power emanates from Madonna's new vocal range, as she proudly proclaims "And I feel/ quicker than a ray of light." The material on "Ray of Light," benefits greatly from Madonna's increased yet rather restrained range, something she worked on through voice lessons for her role in "Evita."

Her introspective lyrics cover every aspect of her life, whether its selling out in "Drowned World/ Substitute of Love" ("I traded fame for love/ without a second thought/ it all became a silly game/ some things cannot be bought") or her relationships with those close to her in the light, softer "Mer Girl" ("I ran from my house/ that cannot contain me/ from the man I cannot keep ... from my daughter that never sleeps"). The multi-layered yet tender "Little Star" also explores her life with her daughter who breathes "new life into my broken heart."

Rather than a collection of radio-friendly singles, "Ray of Light" is a flowing work that shows Madonna's well-developed songwriting and singing skills and, more importantly, proves she best exposes her true self through her music. Mike Prevatt A

Chris Knight, "Chris Knight" (MCA Records Nashville) For those of you who like the twang-filled, mellow tunes associated with country music, here's another earnest – and corny – Nashville singer who's more than happy to croon to you his philosophies about the mystery we call life.

In his debut album, Knight sings 12 nearly identical tracks about love lost, friends long gone and his yearning for the innocence and simplicity of an easier life.

While Knight does have a fairly pleasant voice and his talk of realities and disillusionment of adulthood are cathartic, his easygoing melodies soon become redundant and tired.

One way to distinguish the similar tracks is by listening to the mini-stories Knight packs into each of the songs. "It Ain't Easy Being Me" is a rather contrived and insincere song about what a jerk he thinks he is because he broke his girlfriend's heart. "Framed" is a self-pitying, whiny track about how he was fooled by a woman to commit murder and that it's not really his fault.

After 20 minutes of forlorn and pouty lyrics, accompanied with extended and rather slow melodies, you kind of wish Knight would quit complaining so much. There are, of course, exceptions. "The River's Own," an ode to fathers, picks up the pace just a little bit to breathe some life into this sluggish album. But in general, Knight's album should be reserved for those who believe the saying "misery loves company." Aimee Phan D

The Specials, "Guilty Until Proven Innocent" (Way Cool Music/ MCA Records) Look out Bosstones, step back Aquabats, The Specials are back on the beat. The British ska band that gained popularity in the '80s with hits like "Message To You Rudy," and "Little Bitch" are ready to reclaim their position on the ska circuit. Although this album's tunes aren't quite as memorable as the songs on their self-titled album, a few measure up to The Specials' standards like "Bonediggin" and "Fantasize."

The combination of the horns, guitars, organs and clearly English-accented vocals on certain songs makes the album uniquely different than the recent ska wave hitting the radio today. Whining girls and men who need to clear their throats do not show up on this album. But the classic reggae influence that the band has always used does present itself. Still, some songs prove The Specials have watched what is popular nowadays and taken heed in the recording studio.

The tendencies for bouncing, head bopping and running out to buy every other Specials album released aren't quite there. But after a few listenings, certain songs begin to stick out in your mind and you might just find yourself quoting the crudely humorous lyrics (in a British accent, of course): "Got this funny feeling going through my head that if I go down to the pub I might just end up in bed ... "

Highlights include the three bonus live tracks at the end from the self-titled album, like "Concrete Jungle" with its guitar driven riffs, and "Gangsters," with its traditional ska organs, brass section and bouncy tempo.

This album won't make a diehard ska fan out of you, but it will prove that today's trendy ska isn't the only sound out there. Danielle Myer B

The Vandalias "Buzzbomb!" (Big Deal Records) If lead singer Jim-Jim Vandalia sounded anything like Robin Zander, then his band's blatant attempt to be Cheap Trick might be amusing. But he doesn't, and instead they just sound like crap, or worse, Redd Kross.

As the 11 songs on "Buzzbomb!" prove, this band couldn't find a hook in a tackle shop. Instead Jim-Jim, Alan and Bobby, who purport to be brothers, preen their way interminably through happy, soft-headed anthems and mopey sensitive boy ballads with a lack of momentum that makes Prefab Sprout sound like the Troggs. Michael Gillette F

Acclaimed director sends 'The Leading Man' overseas

FILM: Australian sensation hopes Americans embrace his latest work, which contains universal themes

BMG Independents

Award-winning director John Duigan (right) directs "The Leading Man," starring Jon Bon Jovi.

By Tommy Nguyen
Daily Bruin Contributor

It's a shame that some things as small as continents and oceans should separate people. Fortunately, good movies travel pretty well, and we're lucky that a handful of films by director John Duigan have been delivered to this side of the hemisphere.

Still, Duigan's status in mainstream America doesn't come close to what he has in his native Australia, where two of his films have won Australian Film Institute Awards (AFI, the country's equivalent to the Academy Awards) for best picture. However, with his latest picture, "The Leading Man," Duigan gets another shot at penetrating geographical barriers.

"I think the film has the capacity to cross over. Audiences (in Australia) have really enjoyed the film," Duigan says. "It's just a matter if we can get enough people in the theaters and start a word of mouth."

The two films that won Duigan the AFI best picture awards are two of the most richly observed dramas about angst-ridden adolescent love: "The Year My Voice Broke" and its sequel "Flirting." Told through the eyes of a young boy named Danny Embling, a soft-spoken geek who dreams of poetry and sweethearts while being the school's punching bag, both films explore with lilting magic the perfect innocence of sexual love – in all of its fervent tenderness and quiet audacities.

Duigan would carry this subject over to the adult side of human relationships, more explicitly and more playfully, in "Sirens," a movie famous for having Elle MacPhearson cavorting about in the nude. And Duigan even takes note of the darker, more carnal search of sexual desire in his film "Wide Sargasso Sea," a boiling over-the-top adaptation of the same-name novel.

"Sexuality is a huge part of our lives," Duigan says, "So if your making a film about characters, it's inevitable."

He explains it further. "Probably at all times in history, but maybe much more now, people feel a great amount of confusion, a questioning of male and female roles, perhaps brought on by the old extremes of puritanism."

In his films, Duigan has a charming way of merrily sticking out his tongue at the respective social norms which dictate sexual morality. Though most of the stuffy societies his films deal with are set in Australia, Duigan wants to locate a certain hypocrisy that is universal rather than specific.

"Actually, I think Australia is pretty relaxed country when it comes to sexual morality, probably more so than most countries I'm familiar with," Duigan points out. "But essentially, I think that people on a more universal level find it quite difficult to negotiate their way through the given confusion of prevailing images.

"Countries like the U.S., for example, where sex is used in a great amount of advertising: you pick up any magazine and there it is," Duigan continues. "Yet a lot of people feel a great amount of guilt when it comes to their own (sexual impulses), uncertain how to relate to one another. It's an important area of human engagement for the arts to comment on."

Duigan's "The Leading Man" seems to also be commenting on the "human engagement" problems of this argument with a more concentrated focus, rather than the peripheral social critiquing he usually dabbles with.

The movie follows a playwright named Felix Webb (played by Lambert Wilson), supposedly Quaye massages crowd with smooth, confident sound

MICHAEL ROSS WACHT

Finley Quaye performs his trademark mix of music genres.

MUSIC: Blending reggae, rock, soul and pop, this singer is anything but uncomfortable on stage

By Michelle Nguyen
Daily Bruin Contributor

In blue jeans and a navy blue sweater, Finley Quaye came onstage at the Roxy on Wednesday night like a guy who had just had a couple of blunts with his mates and wanted to sing to linger on that high-heavy feeling.

The cool confidence of the half-Ghanan, half-Scottish Quaye showed he was very at home with the music scene. He comes from a large musical family. Quaye's father, Cab Quaye, is a jazz composer and his brother has played guitar for Elton John and Hookfoot and Hall and Oates in the '70s.

Or maybe his demeanor stems from a person who takes success even-handedly. Someone had taken Quaye's demo unwittingly, and immediately five record labels came seeking him out. Now he's burning up charts in England and throughout Europe.

The audience did not seem to have any doubts about his understated style. Their heads had been nodding to the DJ who was spinning reggae anthems previously, and their heads just kept on happily nodding when Quaye began.

His debut album "Maverick a Strike," a blend of reggae, rock, soul and pop, has an appeal that was sure to attract a diverse crowd. Alternating between British ex-pats familiar with the London scene and new American fans, it was an eclectic audience, peppered with hard-core reggae fans donning their tribal head gear and mainstream-minded yuppies.

Quaye's voice was album-perfect, sounding as smooth, controlled and beautifully nasal as always. With cigarette in hand, he offered his idealistic and romantic musings in non-theatrical

Music networks reveal the stories behind the stardom

ROCKUMENTARIES: New shows provide insights into lives of celebrities

By David Bauder
The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Think rockumentary, and the image comes to mind of Spinal Tap's Nigel Tufnel, staring vacantly at an interviewer who can't understand why turning the knob on an amplifier to "11" gives his guitar a little extra juice.

For years, that wonderful parody made it impossible to take the concept of a rock 'n' roll documentary seriously.

VH1 and MTV are challenging the Spinal Tap curse, however, with new rockumentaries presented back-to-back on Sunday nights. Despite some limitations, "Behind the Music" and "Ultrasound" bring new life to the notion of telling stories about people who make music.

Each seems an obvious solution for the dilemma that network executives face. MTV and VH1 are constantly looking for programming other than videos, without the risk of alienating audiences by straying too far from music.

"There are certainly outlets for documentaries, and they could have covered music stories, but they haven't," said Jeff Gastin, VH1's senior vice president of programming. "It was just natural for VH1 to do that. We wanted to go beyond music videos and add some substance."

The two shows add heft to their networks, which are to be commended for giving serious treatment to topics that often don't receive it in the media. VH1's "Behind the Music" documentaries generally appeal to the graying rock fan targeted by the network. MTV's faster-paced "Ultrasound" goes for a younger crowd.

Premiering six months ago, "Behind the Music," on VH1 at 9 p.m. EST, has profiled Fleetwood Mac, the Carpenters and Jerry Lee Lewis. It has also detailed how rap star Hammer made and then lose millions of dollars.

"Ultrasound," MTV's new series at 10 p.m. EST, looked at the roots of rap, talked to Madonna about her latest musical shift and probed rock 'n' roll feuds.

Will the shows' reputations suffer if they trade independence for access to the stars?

The Madonna feature capitalized on the rapport that MTV News anchor Kurt Loder has with the star. The rap history lesson combines reminiscing with looking pointedly at where rap is today.

Rappers do almost all of the talking on the MTV segment "Back in the Day," not narrators or critics. "We don't want that to come at the expense of hearing from the artists themselves,"

> "Behind the Music" and "Ultrasound", bring new life to the notion of telling stories about people who make music.

said Lauren Lazin, the MTV series' executive producer.

In most respects, she said, "Ultrasound" is a traditional documentary with strong storytelling techniques. There are few of those quick camera cuts and special effects that can make watching an MTV video so headspinning.

The upcoming show about feuds will feature the revolving lead singers of Van Halen and the battling Gallagher brothers of Oasis. "The theme of the show is: Music brings people together, but don't tell the people who created it," Lazin said.

VH1's "Behind the Music" is just what the title implies. With such features as the oft-played profile of Fleetwood Mac, it unearths intriguing details about personal events that motivate the music.

During the documentary on Jerry Lee Lewis, the "Killer" reveals his surprise that listeners thought his song, "Great Balls of Fire," was about sex. Then the show chronicles his descent into surliness and substance abuse. "I thought I was having a good time," he says, "but apparently I wasn't having quite as good a time as I thought I was having."

Lewis' story plays out as a redemption tale; recovered, he is now able to pay loving attention to his family. Yet it raises suspicions about whether his cooperation with VH1 had something to do with how the story is told.

The documentary by no means ignores the star's dark side. But it doesn't hold him accountable for his actions, either, and even complains about how the press "harped" on his life tragedies.

VH1's documentary about Rick James gives only token voice to victims' stories about the violent crimes that put the rocker in prison, while spending more time on James' explanations.

MTV also revealed recently that, at Madonna's request, it cut footage of her baby from the "Ultrasound" feature. Normally that's a journalistic no-no; MTV claimed compassion for the baby.

Gastin, a former executive at NBC News, acknowledged a tradeoff in getting cooperation from celebrities. But their insights, he said, ultimately make the program more interesting.

"We're not trying to do investigative journalism. It's not '60 Minutes.' It's an entertainment channel," said Gastin.

Although the two networks didn't necessarily plan it that way, the two shows could mesh in making Sunday night documentary night for viewers who follow the music industry.

"I think we can create a greater interest in looking at the music scene from a serious perspective," MTV's Lazin said. "That benefits everybody."

TOUSSI

don't go to the theater and I'm not bitter. But I want to assure you, there is good theater in Los Angeles. I know, I've seen it. It's just hard to know where it is.

In New York, you've obviously got Broadway. World famous. The closer the theater is to Broadway and 42nd Street, the less likely it is that the play will suck. So how do you find the good theaters in Los Angeles? Well, they're kind of like erogenous zones: you find where they are and then you prod them until that person squeals.

There's no theater district here so you've got to find certain theaters and companies that do good theater. The Odyssey Theater is close to UCLA (at Sepulveda and Olympic) and they've got great stuff pretty much all the time. They've got three theaters to top it off, like a multiplex live theater house. Playhouses in West Hollywood also usually have good theater. Read reviews and remember what theaters get the good reviews consistently.

But my point is lost on you, I suppose. Movies are cheaper, so why not see movies?

I was 7 when I saw my first play and it knocked me off my feet in a way that no movie had been able to and I had seen "E.T." and the "Star Wars" trilogy by that time. The fact that those people are right there in front of you, living, is a great feeling. There's a feeling of electricity when you see a good play. It's kind of like asking why people go to concerts. Because unless it's Beck, the live show is always better than the CD. There's a dynamic there that you just don't get even in the best movies. Even when the plays have been bad, the people I have gone with had a great time (they could be lying bastards but let's assume they aren't). There's something sickly satisfying about watching an actor drop a line or see the actors sweat when the lights blow out. Anything can happen.

But when it's a good play, you get engaged and all the struggles and happiness the actors go through, you go through because you're right there. You're their friend, you're in it with them. And I guarantee you, one good play is equivalent to 10 good movies (yes, even "Titanic").

So for the five to 10 of you who are reading this article, I'll make you a deal: If you go to a play at the Odyssey or in West Hollywood (one that's gotten good reviews) and you don't like it, contact The Bruin, send me your ticket stub and I will gladly reimburse you for half the price of the ticket.

If you do like it, I won't be surprised.

person." he says. "There's no dialogue in the book at all, and yet it's a brilliantly written piece. Sometimes it's quite difficult to read because, as a writer, the Giles of the novel does all sorts of gymnastics with words. That's something I think you can do in a novel. You can choose a certain way of speaking which is very 'characterful;' it tells us a lot about the awfulness of this character."

> "If (this movie) doesn't work, I'd better make 'Hotpants College II.'"
> Richard Kwietniowski
> Writer and director

Another important aspect that Kwietniowski is familiar with is the difference between the American and British cultures.

"(Giles) uses a lot of words like 'perhaps' and 'rather,' 'rather not' and so on. To try to get a sort of evenness there in the way that he talks, which would feel very different to the way, for instance, that Long Islanders talk, which is much fresher and 'How ya doin'!' And yet to have a certain cross-fertilization."

To provide the strong contrast in the characters, Kwietniowski started at the beginning and found a cast of actors that strongly contrasted as well.

"Before I'd met either of them, I would put a photograph of John next to a photograph of Jason, and it always made me smile," Kwietniowski recalls. "I was absolutely determined to try and cast it in a way that reflected the storyline."

Within the drama of "Love and Death," there is also a comic spoof of American teen movies. After doing extensive research on this, he became fascinated with its perverseness, oftentimes being very "phallocentric" (having an obsession with the penis).

"I went to my video store and rented every single 'Porky's' film, and I saw lots of things with titles like 'Lemon Popsicle' and 'The Last American Virgin' and I discovered that they're in fact actually quite intriguing at a certain level," he says.

Kwietniowski tried to reflect the intensity of these films that appeal to a cult following by paying serious attention to the filming of the scenes in which Ronnie acts in his movies. He attempted to accurately simulate them by using special techniques such as "zooms, hand-held camera for no reason and Dutch angles (contrasting opposing diagonal shots)," which he feels is trademark of this genre of movies.

"It was slightly scary because we realized that we were doing them quite well, and I thought that this is my future career here," he jokes. "If 'Love and Death' doesn't work, I'd better make 'Hotpants College II.'"

While he may excel at cheesy teen movies, Kwietniowski's focus in this movie was much deeper.

At the center of the story is Giles' process of self-discovery, which is something he believes has a universal meaning for everyone, despite their detachment to the specific plot of the movie.

"The way (Giles) lives in London is not really to be alive," he explains. "He doesn't have contact with anything he doesn't already know everything about. He doesn't ever encounter anything different – he doesn't even have a television. He is apparently the master of everything around him, and I think that's like being dead, really. I think to be alive is to be stimulated by all sorts of things– cultural things, racial things, sexual things, differences, gender.

"It's the story of his rebirth and his finding new worlds, which is the United States, which is modern technology, which is popular culture, and being terribly enriched by it."

Ultimately, the story revolves around Giles' coming of age, although Kwietniowski presents it in an unusual and unexpected form. But that is his point.

"What it's saying, if anything, is something very simple: difference is good. To be alive is to live and acknowledge something different about yourself. You might be gay. You might be left-handed. And the diversity is what being human is all about."

FILM: "Love and Death on Long Island" is currently in theaters.

DUIGAN

England's greatest living playwright and on the verge of having one of his masterpieces staged: a play about an assassin unexpectedly falling in love with the woman he's supposed to kill.

Oddly, Felix's play would find some footing in his own private stage. He hires a hunky actor, who ironically plays the assassin in Felix's play, to get rid of his wife. Felix doesn't want the wife killed, however, but rather seduced so that she would leave their marriage freely. The feckless Felix feels too much moral guilt to leave his family on his own terms, even though his lover has been waiting for him for quite some time.

"I found a lot of ironic humor in the script. The concept of a writer who starts to believe he can manipulate the world the way he can manipulate the characters of his plays – the Faustian dimension of the script I found very interesting," Duigan comments.

The script was written by his sister, Virginia Duigan, and the story indeed creates more connections between Felix's life and art, that is until all the connections snap at the film's sobering conclusion. But Duigan found his sister's script attractive beyond its storyline.

"I also thought this would be fun to do because I like ensemble casts. And we've got together a very interesting group of actors for the film," he explains.

The ensemble cast includes "Jefferson in Paris" alum Thandie Newton, a Duigan film regular ("Flirting" and "The Journey of August King") who plays Felix's lover in the movie. Later this year she has a starring role in Jonathan Demme's highly anticipated "Beloved."

"I think she's as good as it gets," Duigan says of the rising young actress.

International star Anna Galiena, whose heart-pounding radiance in "The Hairdresser's Husband" made it one of the stand-out films of 1992, plays the wife in "The Leading Man" with equal elegance.

"I wanted to have someone who was innately sensual in herself," Duigan says of his casting of Galiena, "so one could draw this arc of this woman seduced by this grotesque manipulation, but then finds herself completely liberated anyway."

But the most interesting choice was Jon Bon Jovi, who plays the "leading" man both in Felix's play and in his wife's unexpected romantic affair. Although Jovi has already entered the acting world in such films as "Moonlight and Valentino," Duigan was unaware of these talents.

"When Jon was first suggested, I didn't take the idea too seriously – as far as I knew he was a rock-n-roll star," Duigan admits. "But I discovered that he had a real understanding of the character from the first time we talked about it. And I thought this could be good, the fact that he's a star from another medium gives his role a little extra bite, because (the character in the movie) is a star from Hollywood coming over to London as well."

But Jovi isn't the only talent of the movie who's involved in ironic exchange between life and art. For the first time, Duigan will soon direct a studio project, for MGM. This resembles Felix's decision to a write a screenplay for Paramount at the end of "The Leading Man." Perhaps this will give Duigan the opportunity to reach a wider audience in the United States.

"(Working for the studios) was something I resisted until quite recently ... but I'm actually looking forward to the opportunity to do something with a larger budget than the ones I've had before," Duigan says.

Let's just hope that directors travel as well as films do when coming to the States.

FILM: "The Leading Man" is currently playing at the Mann Theater in Westwood.

QUAYE

earnestness. When he broke away from his focused gaze on the mike, he would occasionally crack a knowing, boyish smile to the audience.

Cradling Quaye's crisp croon was the eight-piece band. Tie-dies, sunglasses and dreads made up the visuals for most of the members. After doing an easy, altered version of his hit, "Even After All," the band received a carte blanche from Quaye to jam on free and ferocious without him.

The three piece brass set went on to solo individually, a reminder of how sweet it is to hear the rhythmic vein of jazz giving life-blood to its reggae cousin. The scent of sweet, green smoke curled its way around the tight and simple reggae-esque riffs.

> Quaye's show flowed without breaks of onstage banter. The band just wanted to play and no one was going to argue.

The saxophonist caressed his notes teasingly during "It's Great When We're Together" but joined his fellow trumpet player and trombonist later to jump it up ska-style in with their short, blaring notes as they moved in unison. With lips jutting forward and tightly pursed, the bassist would look to the sky in his dark sunglasses as he etched out the groove-line for the audience to follow.

Quaye's show flowed without breaks of onstage banter. The band just wanted to play and no one was going to argue about that. The audience snapped out of its chill mode and became jumpy teenagers when the hit "Sunday Shining" was played.

The seductive, bass-heavy "Falling" had the guitarist swirling his head round and round, eyes closed in bittersweet agreement. It was as if he felt what Quaye was saying, as he sang the lyrics "Feel like I've been down this lonely track before."

Known as a drummer who practices with knives while waiting for the toast to pop up or on poles waiting for the train, Quaye gave us a taste of this practice when he joined the bongo drummer towards the end of the night.

There were a couple mediocre songs that lacked the verve needed in uncomplicated reggae-like rhythms. They seemed to drift off into oblivion, almost devoid of distinction, but very few reggae artists avoid this pothole, whether in concert or on album.

To the delight of the crowd, only the guitarist and keyboardist came back out with Quaye for the encore. With an acoustic guitar in hand, the guitarist strummed "Your Love Gets Sweeter" for Quaye as they played like two island boys basking in the sun. Quaye provoked the crowd to shout back affirmations to him as he sang the lyrics "Everyone knows music/ everyone knows shapes," proving that the rasta spirit does bring people together.

How to Write an Effective Ad
- Start your ad with the merchandise you are selling. This makes it easier for readers to quickly scan the ads and locate your items.
- Always include the price of your item. Many classified readers simply do not respond to ads without prices.
- Avoid abbreviations—make your ad easy for readers to understand.
- Place yourself in the reader's position, ask what you would like to know about the merchandise, and include that in the ad. Include such information as brand names, colors and other specific descriptions.

DICKERSON

was supposed to hurt the Bruins. It was the three Arizona guards – Mike Bibby, Miles Simon, and Jason Terry – that had the UCLA coaching staff worried.

Despite the fact that he leads his team with 18.6 points per game, he often remains in the shadows on a team laden with superstars.

But Saturday he reversed the roles and turned the trio of guards into merely supporting actors.

"We don't have a go-to guy on this team," Dickerson said. "Usually it's Simon or Bibby or (Jason) Terry, and tonight it was my turn. We just go to the guy that's hot."

Hot?

That would be like saying the Grand Canyon is a small hole in the ground – a gross understatement.

Dickerson was simply sizzling.

He made 10 of his 13 field goal attempts in the second half, including 2-for-3 from beyond the three-point arc.

He scored 13 of the Wildcats' 26 points over the final eight minutes, and six of their final nine over the last two.

"He's had some great games for us, but this is probably his best," Arizona head coach Lute Olson said. "I give our guys a lot of credit for recognizing that (Dickerson) was on a run.

"I thought they did a great job getting him screens and getting him the basketball and then basically just getting out of his way."

What made him particularly hard to stop was that he scored from everywhere.

Of his 11 field goals, he had two-three pointers, five short-range jumpers and four lay-ins.

"He was just on," UCLA guard Toby Bailey said. "We had a hand up every time, he never got an open shot. He just made them."

As for Dickerson, he just thought it was time to show some leadership in his last regular season collegiate contest.

"I just think that I needed to step up for my team," he said. "I'm a senior and I was feeling it and they gave me the ball in the right places and I didn't want to let them down."

TOURNAMENT

Murray State (also coached by a former UCLA assistant coach – Mark Gottfried) in a first-round matchup in the Midwest.

Although the Bruins were virtually guaranteed of gaining a berth, at least one Bruin was a little anxious when the Bruins' placement wasn't announced until the bitter end.

"I was nervous, I didn't think we were going to get in," freshman guard Baron Davis said. "When our name came up, I was relieved."

went through the hole, but the basket didn't count, because the conference freshman-of-the-year was called for a charge with 0:49 left.

"I figured if I went strong to the hole that I would get the call, or it would be a no-call," Davis said. "I thought it would be a no-call, but the refs made a big call. That was a big call. It turned the game around."

Senior Wildcat Michael Dickerson's seven foot jumper on the ensuing possession would give Arizona (27-4, 17-1) a three-point lead with 0:22 remaining. Then the Bruins brought the ball up the court and Davis passed it to Johnson who has consistently hit clutch three-pointers, most notably during last week's Washington trip. But the Wildcats double-teamed Johnson and forced him to pass the ball to an open Davis in the corner. With five seconds left, Davis' three-point attempt went in ... then out.

"It felt great, I had a wide-open look. You know I was shooting it well," said Davis who had already made two three-pointers in the game. "It's just one of those shots you always wish you could have back."

After honoring its seniors before tip-off, a fired-up UCLA opened the game with a 10-0 run. The Bruins would go on to take an eight-point lead at the half. UCLA would run up a 14-point lead soon after intermission, but the Wildcats would slowly eat away at the lead behind their 60.0 percent shooting and Dickerson's 22 second-half points.

Arizona took its first lead of the game, with 1:38 to go, after A.J. Bramlett put back a missed shot. UCLA would counter with a Johnson jumper 17 seconds later, but that would be the last time the Bruins scored. And the three seniors, Toby Bailey, J.R. Henderson and Johnson would have to settle for a loss in their last home game of their careers before a Pauley crowd of 12,799.

"It's real special just to be around those guys and play with them for a whole season," a teary-eyed Davis said. "I just feel bad because we couldn't pull it out for them."

However, despite the fact that the seniors ended their conference career on a losing note, the seniors don't see the glass as half-empty.

"I told the guys before we went out there as long as everybody gives their best effort and leaves it all out there on the court, I'm going to leave here proud of what I accomplished here and proud of what our team did," said Bailey, who almost had a double-double with 22 points and nine boards. "Our team played their hardest, I couldn't ask for anything more."

"The three seniors aren't really tripping off of this," said Johnson, the Bruins' leading scorer with 24 points. "It's sad because it's our last game at Pauley and we took an 'L', but ... we saw (Saturday) how good we can be and if (Saturday) is not a wake-up call, then we will never be awoken."

keeping men as the active participants – the players – and women as the occasional grace on the sidelines.

But sometimes those women wanted to cross over the sidelines and do what the men were doing. This movement coincided with the New Woman's emergence into the public sphere of jobs and politics, as well as the bicycle craze.

Women and men both rode bicycles. It was a cool fad back then, and it was very liberating for the women. They got to wear short dresses and riding pants that were specifically-designed for women bicyclists.

This lead to further freedom because they were not confined to long dresses and corsets that had been fashionable during the Victorian era.

While there had been women athletes before the bicycle insanity at all levels of society, the turn of the century created an explosion in sports interest among women, and we still see the effects of these changes today – successful college athletics' programs, the Women's NBA, the Colorado Silver Bullets baseball team, and women sports journalists, among others.

Women in sports have come a long way, but there is still progress to be made.

Wilcox's next story on women in sports will detail the life of "Babe" Didrikson Zaharias, the jill-of-all-trades in the sports world.

UCLA's women's track and field team completed their first step toward their run at a 1998 Pac-10 and NCAA Outdoor Championship.

The Bruins won the quadrangular meet with a total team score of 115 points over runner-up Long Beach State (30.5), UCSB (29) and Cal State Los Angeles (18.5).

UCLA's trio of Deanna Simmons, Kelly O'Connor and Keisha Porter swept the women's long jump on Saturday afternoon. Simmons won with a jump of 19-1, ahead of good showings from O'Connor (18-5) and Porter (18-4). Simmons also went on to capture the triple jump with a mark of 43-5.

Rachelle Noble and Seilala Sua took the top two places in the women's hammer throw with little competition from the rest of the field.

Noble's top mark of 193-0 and Sua's best throw of 179.9 are early signs of good things to come from these two Bruin women. Sua and Noble went on to take first and third, respectively, in the women's discus with 1997 All-Americans Suzy Powell and Nada Kawar taking second and fourth places.

UCLA took first in the 400 and 1600-meter relays, winning 45.5 seconds and three minutes 51.56 seconds respectively.

With both relay teams consisting of All-Americans Bisa Grant and Joanna Hayes, freshmen Shakedia Jones, Michelle Perry, alternate Damesha Craig, the Bruin women look strong heading into the Cal State Fullerton Invitational next weekend.

Julie Ott won the 3000 with a time of 10:01.20. In the 1500, Christina Bowen, Melinda George and Kara Barnard completed a UCLA sweep over the rest of the competition. Only five seconds separated the Bruin women behind Bowen's winning time of 4:30.79.

Hayes, ranked tenth in the nation in hurdles, won the 200 and 400-meter sprints with winning times of 24.66 and 55.60 seconds, respectively. This was Hayes' first meet since recovering from a hyper-extended knee.

in Arizona history, played a big part in Arizona's huge first-half lead, as she scored 24 points in the game, 16 in the first half.

"(Adia Barnes) got hot. We couldn't keep her off the boards," Olivier said. "She scored whenever she wanted to. That pretty much told the story in the first half."

Olivier lit into the Bruins at halftime, telling them to put some more effort and hustle in the second half.

"I told them if anything we go out of here not because they outworked us but because we lost the game," Olivier said. "We worked hard on the effort and gave a little more than we did in the first half."

With the defeat, the Bruins lost some momentum as they enter the tournament next weekend. The Bruins had come into the game with a five-game winning streak.

"I'm hoping our team stays positive," Olivier said. "I think they have done so all year.

"We are just going to use this game as a guideline for us to get better. When you head into the tournament something that you have to know is that you can't take any breathers when you are out there on the floor. We took a few short cuts tonight and it cost us early in the game."

Olivier believes the Bruins will learn from the defeat as they head into the tournament.

"We think that we have not even played our best basketball yet," Olivier said, whose team captured third place in the Pac-10 – the highest finish the program has earned since the 1991-'92 season.

"We are hoping we can put it all together come first round (of the tournament)."

UCLA wins season's first outdoor meet in a walk

TRACK: Both women, men kill competition, set records as UCLA cruises to easy victory

By Donald Morrison and Alvin Cadman
Daily Bruin Contributors

It was just another Saturday afternoon at Drake Stadium for the UCLA men's and women's track teams. The Bruins, behind some surprisingly fast early season marks, opened up their outdoor season with easy wins at a quad meet over Long Beach State, Cal State Los Angeles and UC Santa Barbara.

UCLA destroyed its competition, winning the meet with 114 points. UCSB finished second with 28 points, Cal State Los Angeles placed third with 25 points and the 49ers had 21 points.

Damian Allen, on his way to NCAA Indoor Nationals next week, opened up his outdoor season by cruising the 400 meters in 46.88 seconds to gain a victory and match his previous personal best at the event.

"I think Allen looked especially good," UCLA head coach Bob Larsen said. "That's an awfully good 400 meters this early for him."

Josh Johnson smashed his old personal record in the javelin throw, winning the event with a mark of 236 feet, 10 inches. Johnson won the event by close to 49 feet over teammate Joe Franklin, who threw 187-2. Johnson's old personal best was 230-1.

Matt Olin set a personal record in the 3000, winning the event in 8 minutes, 27.66 seconds. In his first collegiate 1500, Jess Strutzel won in 3:51.93 seconds.

"We knew since last year that (Strutzel) had the potential to be a 1500-meter runner," Larsen said. "That's a pretty impressive performance."

The sprinters and hurdlers turned in solid performances. Freshman Bryan Harrison won the 100 dash in 10.67 seconds, and Jim McElroy cruised the 200 in 21.36 seconds. Gerimi Burleigh won the 110 high-hurdles in 14.56 seconds. Brian Fell easily won the 400 meter hurdles in 52.86 seconds.

The Bruins also gained victories in the throwing and jumping events.

Luke Sullivan won both the hammer throw, with a mark of 203-7, and the discus with a throw of 184-10. Wade Tift won the shot put with a heave of 59-2. Lester DeRaad won the high jump with a

After first loss, Bruins go for the kill

M. VOLLEYBALL: Friday's errors quickly corrected for almost flawless follow-up

By Vytas Mazeika
Daily Bruin Staff

BYU set out to prove that the top-ranked and undefeated UCLA men's volleyball team wasn't perfect, and they did so impressively with a 15-12, 15-10, 15-8 victory on Friday night.

"Maybe they were not prepared to play," BYU head coach Carl McGown said after Friday's match. "We were certainly more into the match. We're at their place, they're No. 1. So we get excited to play. I'm sure that tomorrow night will be a lot more different."

McGown's prophetic words came true Saturday night as the Bruins (17-1 overall, 11-1 in the Mountain Pacific Sports Federation) responded to their first loss of the season with an almost flawless performance. The Cougars (9-3, 9-3) succumbed to the Bruins in three games 15-5, 15-11, 15-13.

In Friday's loss the Bruins were outblocked a ridiculous 19 to 4.5 and out-hit .349 to .225. Three Bruins hit for negative averages while the trio of junior quick hitter Ryan Millar (22 kills), junior opposite Ossie Antonetti (22) and freshman quick hitter Shane Van Beest (6 blocks) led the Cougars.

"We were just on," Millar said Friday night. "The coaches did a really good job telling us where to block and we just stuck with it. It worked out well and it's very nice."

UCLA head coach Al Scates called for an impromptu, two-hour video session on Saturday to study what went wrong.

The result was a complete turnaround. Only Antonetti experienced success on Saturday, with 24 kills as the Bruins aimed at improving their blocking and taking away both Millar and Van Beest. UCLA out-blocked BYU 15 to 12.5 and senior swing hitter Ben Moselle lead the attack with 26 kills.

"We had to take away all their tendencies and make them beat us doing something they didn't do last night," Scates said. "We did a pretty good job. They out-blocked us last night two to one and we out-blocked them tonight."

UCLA players like junior swing hitter Fred Robins came out with something to prove. Robins collected 2.5 blocks and 22 digs. Scates believes that probably 10 of the 22 digs were converted into UCLA points.

The only knock on the Bruins' performance on Saturday was the inability to finish the match. Up 14-10 in the third game, UCLA squandered nine match points and allowed the Cougars back into the game. On the 10th match point, up 14-13, UCLA senior quick hitter Tom Stillwell served an ace to end the match.

"We have a habit of letting up when we're ahead," Robins said. "We can't do that anymore. It's showtime. We have to get out there and hammer them. We just can't let up and do things like this because teams like (BYU) will come back on us. Maybe even win the game. So we have to go out there and kill them."

The Bruins are no longer undefeated and must re-focus, but a loss is never detrimental to a team's cause unless it comes in the post-season.

Therefore UCLA's loss on Friday night will take the pressure of an undefeated season away and allow them to concentrate on their national championship aspirations.

"I'm not disappointed (about not being undefeated anymore)," sophomore quick hitter Adam Naeve, who tallied 45 kills this weekend, said. "I thought it was good for us. It's a wake-up call for one and it definitely showed us our weaknesses. Now we can work on them."

Tremendous comeback not enough to tame Wildcats

W. BASKETBALL: Winning streak ends, but Bruins still hopeful for tourney

By Chris Umpierre
Daily Bruin Contributor

The UCLA women's basketball team's youth has been the secret of much of their success this season. But on Saturday their youth and inexperience shot them in the foot.

After closing No. 9 Arizona's 23-point halftime lead to just five with 2:35 left, the No. 23 Bruins (19-8, 14-4 in the Pac-10) turned the ball over on four consecutive possessions in the last two minutes to fall to the Wildcats 84-73 in Tucson, Ariz.

"I think since our team is so young we got excited that we came back," UCLA head coach Kathy Olivier said, who has nine sophomores on the team, four of which start. "I told them to slow down in those last two minutes.

"That's something we talked about in the locker room (after the game) and something we have to get better at, just taking care of the basketball."

Behind inspired play by All-American candidate Maylana Martin and center Janae Hubbard in the second half, who finished the game with 24 and 16 points, respectively, the Bruins slowly chipped at the Wildcats' huge lead.

Martin's basket from the elbow of the key at the 4:25 mark of the second half put the sophomore forward in a select group of Bruins. The basket gave Martin over 1,000 points after two seasons at UCLA. Only two players in UCLA history have completed that feat: Necie Thompson and Hall of Famer Denise Curry.

With 2:35 left in the game the Bruins had trimmed the Wildcat lead to 75-70 and had possession of the ball. Sophomore point guard Erica Gomez turned the ball over on the ensuing possession.

After getting fouled, Arizona's Adia Barnes hit the front end of a one-and-one to increase the Wildcat lead to 76-70. On the very next possession, freshman guard LaCresha Flannigan turned the ball over when Arizona's Marte Alexander jumped in front of her pass. Alexander then got fouled and went on to make one of two from the line.

Gomez got the rebound and raced up court only to have her pass intercepted by Arizona's Resea Bristol. After being immediately fouled, Bristol missed both of her free throws.

When the Bruins tried to set up their half-court offense with just over a minute left down seven points, 77-70, Martin threw an errant pass into the crowd.

"We tried to get a couple of quick baskets and in the process we turned the ball over," Olivier said.

After getting fouled with 33 seconds left, Barnes hit both of her free throws to extend the Wildcat lead to 79-70 and Arizona wouldn't have to look back again.

All told, the Bruins committed 26 turnovers in the game with Gomez leading the way with nine.

Nevertheless, UCLA's courageous comeback cannot be forgotten.

"I think the comeback was a big step for us," Olivier said. "Against Stanford (a game in which UCLA lost 105-80) we really never made a comeback after we got down.

"I think the players stayed together and stayed focused. We chipped away at the lead but they just ended up being the better team tonight."

Arizona (21-6, 14-4 in the Pac-10) built much of their first-half lead because they out-hustled the Bruins for loose balls and rebounds.

Untimely injuries force UCLA to rearrange lineup, pitching rotation

BASEBALL: Bruins still optimistic about season despite recent obstacles

By Kristina Wilcox
Daily Bruin Staff

Bad luck has taken hold of the baseball team this season, especially in the injury department.

The Bruins were able to avoid the demons throughout last season while advancing to the College World Series, but the 1998 team has to overcome a lot of obstacles to make it that far again this year. A big roadblock appeared suddenly last week.

Left-handed starting pitcher Rob Henkel (1-3, 8.72 ERA in 5 starts) was told on Wednesday afternoon that he needs to go under the knife for season-ending elbow surgery. Henkel is disheartened by this news.

"I've never had any broken bones or sprains," Henkel said. "After the Stanford series (Feb. 20-22), I knew that it wasn't happening for me this year, and the doctors confirmed it.

"This injury was a gradual thing. My elbow has been hurting for a couple of months. It was the continual use, not just one pitch."

Meanwhile, Henkel's partner on the disabled list, catcher Jason Green, was caught off-guard by the injury.

> Rob Henkel ... needs to go under the knife for season-ending elbow surgery.

"I never saw it coming," Green said. "I knew his arm was sore, but he never spoke up to me about it. When he would pitch, he would have good stuff, and then lose command early on, so he wasn't going as long into the game as we would like. But he was untested as a starter, since he was a reliever last year."

UCLA was counting heavily on Henkel to be the No. 1 starter in the pitching rotation, but in Henkel's absence, head coach Gary Adams and his assistants will have some work to do in rearranging their roster and pitching rotation.

"We just have to pick up his rifle and keep marching on," Adams said. Green knows that the march won't be easy.

"It's gonna hurt us," Green said.

Nonetheless, Henkel is optimistic for the team in the wake of the reshuffling that will have to occur.

"Our pitching staff is definitely going to come around and do great for the rest of the season," Henkel said. "We need someone to step up, and I know that someone will."

UCLA (9-13, 4-7 in Six-Pac) hosted No. 8 Arizona State for three games at Jackie Robinson Stadium this weekend. The Bruins took the first contest, 6-5, courtesy of centerfielder Eric Valent's ninth-inning solo homerun, his seventh homer of the season. The Sun Devils won the final two, 14-6 and 9-3.

Women play important role in history of sports

ATHLETES: Recognition has seldom been given to pioneering females

By Kristina Wilcox
Daily Bruin Staff

You'd never figure that there are so many sports out there just by looking at the Daily Bruin's back page sports section.

No, it takes a trip to the library, a glance through a general sports book's index, and then you see the truth.

The truth that there are numerous sports out there, and women have been involved in each of them.

March is Women's History Month, as you may or may not know. In homage to women who have participated in the sports arena, the Daily Bruin will take part in the annual frenzy of feminist propaganda in order to shine the spotlight on familiar "feminine" names and those dug out of the annals of ancient sports history.

DIANA LEE/Daily Bruin

Back to the index search. My realization actually took place while sitting on the floor at the Sisterhood bookstore, perusing a lovely book compiled by a man (gasp!) called, inspiringly, "Women In Sports." I wanted to see just how many sports women have played some role in over the course of American History. I was totally overwhelmed.

For every sport, a woman has played a prominent role, and has often not been recognized for her efforts. And when there's an attempt to recognize her, uptight individuals try to contest the move.

It's unfortunate that women have been relegated to the side ring in sports, but it reflects society's view of how the power structure should be set up.

Commercialized spectator sports emerged in the United States during the prosperous industrialization half of the 1800s, which gave people extra time and money to devote to their personal lives.

It was considered natural and normal for men to play important roles in these sports because of the dominant notion of "separate spheres," an outgrowth of Victorian notions of gender: men belonged out in the public realm, and women belonged in the private sphere, preferably her own home.

So with the growing interest in spectator sports, the power structure had to be maintained by

Sixth seed satisfies Bruins

TOURNAMENT: Match-up versus Miami Hurricanes begins post-season play

By Brent Boyd
Daily Bruin Staff

The Bruins have Georgia on their mind.

And the Miami Hurricanes.

UCLA (22-8) will travel to Atlanta to battle Miami (18-9) in the first round of the NCAA Tournament Friday at a time yet to be determined.

The 19th-ranked UCLA men's basketball team was given the sixth seed in the South Region of the 1998 NCAA Tournament to begin later this week, and as a result, a match-up with the 11th-seeded Hurricanes.

"(The sixth seed) was right on the mark compared to where we figured we would be," head coach Steve Lavin.

The South region is one of the toughest in the Tournament, with Duke, Kentucky, Michigan taking the top three seeds.

Should UCLA beat Miami – which won only six of its final 14 games en route to a second-place finish in the Big East 7 – a match-up with the winner of third-seeded Michigan and 14th-seeded Davidson.

The other two games in the first round in Atlanta's Georgia Dome will include Kentucky versus South Carolina State and Massachusetts versus St. Louis.

"I think it is a strong region, no question," Lavin said. "It's a region we're looking forward to playing in.

"Everybody in the region is a quality opponent. They have the ability to play both speeds and are athletic."

Other than Duke, the other top-seeded teams are Arizona (West), Kansas (Midwest), and North Carolina (East).

The Pac-10 was well-represented in the brackets. In addition to Arizona and UCLA, Stanford was given the third seed in the Midwest, while Washington was given the 11th seed in the East.

To the surprise of many and the disappointment of some, UCLA was not placed in the same region as Rhode Island (which is coached by former Bruin head coach Jim Harrick).

However, Rhode Island will meet

M. BASKETBALL: Arizona star Dickerson's play overshadows UCLA seniors' last home game

By Brent Boyd
Daily Bruin Staff

Oh, the irony.

On a day when UCLA's seniors were celebrated, idolized and honored, it was Arizona's own senior sensation Michael Dickerson who took the leading role and stole the show on the Pauley Pavilion stage Saturday.

Dickerson scored down low, scored from the outside and wreaked havoc on the defensive end to spur the second-ranked Wildcats to their come-from-behind victory over the Bruins.

"He was the difference today," UCLA head coach Steve Lavin said. "He played like a first-team All-American. He played like a player-of-the-year candidate."

And though a berth on the All-American squad still remains in limbo, Dickerson certainly showed why he made the first-team all-conference team by scoring 30 points – including 22 points in the second half to seal the Wildcat victory.

The funny thing is, it wasn't Dickerson who

M. HOOPS: Missed three-pointer, questionable charging call cost UCLA victory against Wildcats

By Emmanuelle Ejercito
Daily Bruin Senior Staff

It was supposed to be a happily-ever-after ending in Pauley Pavilion to a senior year that has seen all the imaginable highs and lows that can happen in a college season.

The No. 19 UCLA men's basketball team played intense, dominating and at times brilliant basketball for most of the game last Saturday. The Bruins (22-8 overall, 12-6 Pac-10) owned the lead for 38 minutes and 36 seconds; however, No. 2 Arizona would claim the lead when it counted – at the end – as the Wildcats defeated UCLA 91-87.

"It was scripted perfectly," senior Kris Johnson said, "but (Arizona) just put a wrench in it."

The game hinged on a call that could have gone either way – and unfortunately for the Bruins, it didn't go theirs.

Down by one with less than a minute remaining, freshman Baron Davis, who had an impressive game with highlight lay-ups and 16 points, drove down the baseline for a basket. The ball

USC fires, UCLA hires maestro

ACADEMICS: Ex-professor says school dismissed him unjustly based on rival's false assertions

By Rachel Muñoz
Daily Bruin Staff

As the principal violist for the Los Angeles Philharmonic, any university should feel privileged to have Evan Wilson teach their students.

However, USC just fired him.

Wilson claims that he lost his job on February 26 because of a mandate by competitive USC professor Don McInnes, saying that it was either him or Wilson. According to Wilson, the dean of the USC music department, Larry Livingston, felt that McInnes had too much leverage, and he let Wilson go.

Livingston refused to comment on the situation.

Up until a couple months ago, Wilson has had a great experience at USC. He thinks highly of the school, calling it "the Juliard of the West." "USC was something important to me," he said.

Over the last five years at USC as a part-time professor, Wilson has been teaching private string lessons. He will be leaving eight students. Wilson also taught an orchestral repertoire class and a string class.

The problems started to surface in December 1997. He was called into the dean's office to discuss a full-time professorship. After this discussion, Wilson says he began to experience a cold reception from McInnes.

Only one month after discussing a full-time job with the university, Wilson was called back to speak with the associate dean and the chairman of the music department. Their discussion focused on Wilson being terminated from the school. "I was on the verge of being released," he said.

According to Wilson, in that one-month time frame, three faculty members alleged that Wilson's students had not received their lessons, and that he had been bad-mouthing

Eric DeLeon was subject to dismissal. He took time off from UCLA, landed a well-paying job, and might have never gone back to school.

But the Retention of American Indian Students Now! (RAIN!), a Student Retention Center project geared towards enhancing American Indian students' success, helped put him back on the right track.

"If it wasn't for RAIN!, I probably wouldn't be here now," said DeLeon, a second-year English student and member of the Lakota tribe.

"(RAIN!) motivated me into getting back into academics. It opened my eyes to what school meant to me. It made me realize how important my education is," DeLeon said.

Every time a student buys a UCLA sweatshirt, whenever an alum purchases a UCLA license plate frame, and whenever a parent buys a "I'm a UCLA Mom" t-shirt – they aren't just giving money to their school, they're paying one of UCLA's many licensees.

As it would be impossible for UCLA to manufacture and sell all of the merchandise associated with the school, licenses are given to various corporations to make and market UCLA paraphernalia.

The Associated Students of UCLA (ASUCLA) has the responsibility of choosing and overseeing licensees and also receives the royalties from the sales.

"We've been delegated the authority to protect the trademark and to benefit from the royalties associated with the trademark," said ASUCLA Executive Director Patricia Eastman.

According to ASUCLA licensing manager Cindy Holmes, there are about 230 corporations associated with the UCLA trademark.

One of these licensees is Russell Athletic. According to John McMeekin, Russell Athletic's

USAC: Representative seeks less bureaucracy, more balanced inquries

By Dennis Lim
Daily Bruin Contributor

Sexual harassment cases at UCLA often go unresolved for years, and are often biased against the victim, according to Darnell Grisby, General Representative in the Undergraduate Student Association Council (USAC).

Grisby, who himself has filed a sexual harassment complaint and seen no resolution, says that administration policies on sexual harassment fail to help the victim.

"The sexual harassment policies at this school are very non-victim friendly," Grisby said.

Currently, sexual harassment complaints from students and faculty are dealt with by the Human Resources division of ASUCLA.

To counter this trend of non-victim friendly policies, the general representative has begun a campaign to change the administration's policies on sexual harassment.

Grisby's campaign will begin Thursday with a petition to Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs,

Asian American Studies minor now offered

The Asian American Studies Interdepartmental Program has created a new minor to replace the current specialization that has existed in the program for over 10 years.

Adding only one more class to the course requirements for the minor, the upgrade is still a significant one. Qualitatively, a minor carries much more weight than the specialization, according to Cindy Fan, chair of the Asian American Studies Program.

The minor was established to meet the growing demands of non-Asian American studies majors who wanted to pursue a background in the study of Asian and Pacific people in the United States.

Applications to the minor are being accepted as of Winter 1998. The change formally signifies the end of the Asian American Studies specialization.

Survey shows more women attend college

Women used to go to college to find a husband. They were told to major in fields such as home economics that would help them succeed at home. Gender discrimination wasn't even prohibited in education until 1972.

Times have changed. Women have been a majority at most universities for more than a decade. Their proportion in the student population now closely mirrors society.

"More women are involved in programs; more women are actively involved," said Rebecca Peatow, Women's Center office manager. "I see more women in the classroom."

In fact, more women are going to college nationwide than men. Recent U.S. Census Bureau statistics found that 36 percent of female high school graduates between 18 and 24 years old went to college in 1994. Only 33.1 percent of men in the same group went.

Those percentages have remained stable in the 1990s. Safety can factor into the college decision for those women, Peatow said. The ASUO Women's Center answered several calls after the Student Conduct Code was revised to strengthen its anti-rape rules. Parents wanted to know if the changes indicated a growing problem.

But traces of the old inequalities still exist in the majors men and women choose. Men dominate the hard sciences, business and computer science. Women dominate the fields of education, psychology and biology.

Recent studies have shown that teachers often give girls less attention than boys, said Marjorie DeBuse, director of youth enrichment with the College of Education. According to the studies, boys often clamor for attention in elementary school, demanding their teacher's attention.

EQUALITY OF LIFE

The battle that first received public attention at Seneca Falls, New York continues today as women struggle for national child care, academic progress and a shattered glass ceiling

By Carol McKay
Daily Bruin Staff

Women have come a long way, baby. But there's still a long way to go.

March, which is Women's History Month, has arrived at UCLA, celebrating "The Empowerment of Women" over the last 150 years.

Since the first step in the American women's rights movement was taken in 1848 at Seneca Falls, New York, women have worked their way towards the goal of equality along a bumpy road.

Not until 1920 were women granted the right to vote by the 19th Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

But the win was quickly countered with an immediate loss. One year later, when Margaret Sanger formed the American Birth Control League, which would later pave the way for Planned Parenthood programs across the country, she faced much opposition and was even imprisoned.

> "I know that ... women can be intimidated in classrooms that are male-dominated."
> Kristin Herdman
> Fourth-year student

Throughout the struggle, women have felt both the pride of victory and the disappointment of defeat. The Equal Rights Amendment (ERA), first introduced to Congress in 1923, has still not been ratified in enough states.

The amendment, which demands equality for women, is a vague document that faced much opposition, even at its height in the 1970s.

"The ERA had its moment, but I can't imagine that it will be revived," said Ruth Bloch, chair of the women's studies program at UCLA and associate professor of history. "I think it got a bum rap."

Bloch explained that due to the vagueness of the amendment, it would have required much interpretation by the courts.

When the media focused on the potential extremes in which the amendment could result – such as unisex bathrooms and requiring women to participate in combat – many people were offended, and the ERA was not ratified by enough states by its deadline.

The ERA, despite its failed attempts at passage, brought about many questions on the definition of equality, Bloch said. "What's equality? Maybe it's sameness. Maybe it's coerced sameness."

Even women can't always agree upon that issue, and the resulting conflicts within the feminist movement have created external challenges.

"It isn't a public mass movement that is visible in the streets. The character of the movement has changed a lot," she said. The shift of women into academic fields has been one of the most beneficial ways of advancing.

"But (the movement) has never been that united. There's no such thing as 'feminism.' And there's certainly no one 'feminist'," she said. "But it's one of the things that makes the movement healthy – a lot of internal debate without people at each other's throats."

Despite the progress women have made in the last 150 years, many feel there is still much room – and need – for improvement.

Psychologists reveal memory's complexity

RESEARCH: Discovery may lead to better treatment for amnesia, Parkinson's disease patients

By Matt Grace
Daily Bruin Contributor

For anyone who has walked to the refrigerator, opened the door, stared inside and then wondered why you are there, when just moments before you got up to do something completely different, relax. You are not alone.

A recent study on learning mechanisms – like the habit-formed behavior above – by UCLA psychologist Barbara Knowlton provides new insight into the regions of the brain responsible for learning and memory.

"It seems that memory is composed of multiple systems," Knowlton said. "There are different kinds of memory that depend on different brain systems."

Knowlton tested amnesiacs with a dysfunctional hippocampus and patients with Parkinson's disease – a disorder affecting the basal ganglia.

When either of these brain systems fail, individuals reflect a corresponding difficulty learning new things depending on the region affected.

"This particular project is to see if we can understand more about the role of these structures," Knowlton said. "Potentially that could help design therapeutic treatments and help to understand these (disorders) a little more.

"The hippocampus is more important for conscious explicit learning of facts and events," Knowlton said, and the basal ganglia is fundamental for "implicit or unconscious learning."

Explicit memory refers to the processes through which people deliberately attempt to learn and recollect something – like studying for a test.

In contrast, implicit memory operates on a unconscious level. Skills like riding a bike involve the automatic recollection and influence of prior experiences.

The research focused on habit-learning – a form of implicit memory which relies on the gradual acquisition of associations or cues.

For example, learning the route to a specific destination like school depends on habit-learning. At first, a person must think about the street names and the appropriate turns Eventually, the route becomes automatic; recognition of certain visual cues decreases the amount of original thought needed until a habit forms.

"In a well-learned habit you are just responding based on the stimuli," Knowlton said, "not on whatever goal that stimulus was ultimately paired with."

Knowlton provided evidence for this in an experiment using rats. After the rats learned to associate a light in a maze with food,

HARASSMENT

Winston Doby, to change current sexual harassment policy.

The campaign aims to accomplish three goals: the re-activation of the Committee on Sexual Harassment, reduction of bureaucracy in harassment grievance procedures, and the production of sexual harassment policies that are more friendly to victims.

The campaign aims to restructure the Committee on Sexual Harassment, an advisory board to the university regarding its sexual harassment policy, that has not met in more than a year and a half. Grisby aims to get heavy representation of USAC-approved students and staff on the committee.

In addition, those on the campaign wish to reduce the "layers of bureaucracy" involved in filing a sexual harassment complaint. This, they claim, would make policies more victim-friendly.

"Students have a very high turn-over rate, and the sexual harassment policies don't accommodate that," said Faneeza Mohamed, a staff person in Grisby's office.

According to the General Representative's office, a complaint goes through numerous committees, each of which have their own fact-finding group. Each fact-finding group then conducts its own investigation of the complaint.

"Before students leave they should have some resolution to their complaints, but some of these investigations can take years to resolve. They need to streamline the number of investigations per complaint," she continued.

Keith Parker, the Staff Affirmative Action Officer, who deals with sexual harassment complaints from staff members, sees things differently.

> Campaigners claim that the university tends to protect faculty in sexual harassment cases.

Parker sees the "layers of bureaucracy" as a welcome improvement from the previous system.

"Before, one office and, in essence, one person handled complaints from students, faculty, and staff. That was a problem, since sexual harassment complaints are very labor-intensive – that office would frequently get overwhelmed," Parker said.

Lastly, the campaign aims to change the university's sexual harassment policies from being largely faculty-oriented to being more victim-oriented. Campaigners claim that the university tends to protect faculty in sexual harassment cases.

"Faculty members on this campus have a lot of influence. Combine that political influence with sexual harassment, an already touchy, taboo subject, you get the non-victim friendly policies we have today," Grisby said.

In February, Parker's office, the Staff Affirmative Action Office, was founded to handle sexual harassment complaints dealing with staff.

Responsibility for student sexual harassment complaints are expected to make the transition to the Student Affairs Office in the near future.

Parker contends that the time taken in investigations is needed to allow a thorough investigation where both sides of the complaint can express their views. Cutting that time could compromise the breadth of such investigations.

"If no one else saw the harassment, that doesn't give us a lot to work with," Parker said. "That can leave the impression that the institution is being protected and not the victim, but we still have to look at both sides."

Grisby, though not wanting to compromise the investigations into sexual harassment complaints, feels that an undeniable problem still exists.

"The problem here is like an old house. You can paint it with new paint and make it look new, but the problems on the inside will still persist until you fix them," Grisby explained.

Justices won't revive minority aid program

JURISPRUDENCE: Proof of discrimination will be required by ruling

By Laurie Asseo
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON – The Supreme Court, increasingly skeptical of efforts to give minorities special help without proof of discrimination, refused on Monday to revive a Florida county's affirmative-action program for awarding construction contracts.

The court, without comment, turned away Dade County's argument that discrimination in the local construction industry is severe enough to justify an effort to aid black-owned companies.

The court also declined to hear an appeal by a minority contractors' group that sought to reinstate portions of similar programs in Dade County for companies owned by Chicanos and women.

Monday's actions were not decisions and therefore set no national precedent.

The justices have strictly limited affirmative-action programs in state and local public works projects since 1989, saying such efforts must be narrowly tailored to remedy the effects of past discrimination.

However, a lawyer for the minority contractors' group said that people should not give up on trying to meet that strict legal standard.

"We know there is discrimination and that it's unfortunately alive and well," said Thomas F. Pepe, who represents the Allied Minority Contractors Association. "It's just that it's very difficult to prove discrimination."

With the proper research on the continuing effects of discrimination, it is possible to win court decisions upholding affirmative action programs, Pepe said.

"The construction industry and municipalities need some guidance," added Bob Cuevas, assistant Miami-Dade County attorney. "The standard is strict, but it should be somehow meetable."

In 1995, the Supreme Court said federal programs that aim to help minorities must meet the same strict standard required of state and local governments.

The high court also has restricted the use of racial considerations in drawing election districts, while lower courts have cut back on affirmative action in public university admission policies.

But the Republican-led Congress has not done away with every federal affirmative action program. Last week, the Senate voted to keep a 15-year-old federal program that helps women and minorities win highway construction contracts.

> The high court also has restricted the use of racial considerations in drawing election districts.

In another affirmative-action case Monday, the justices rejected the appeal of a former Nevada college professor who said she was discriminated against because she is white.

Yvette Farmer said the University of Nevada, Reno, unlawfully hired a black sociology professor before her and paid her less when it hired her later. The university said the black professor was more qualified.

The Florida case involved affirmative-action programs adopted in Dade County for black contractors in 1982 and for Hispanic and women contractors in 1994.

The plans set goals for awarding county contracts. The goals could be met by setting aside some contracts for bidding solely by minority-owned firms, requir-

PRISTINA, Yugoslavia – Ethnic Albanians demanded Monday that international experts examine the bodies of dozens killed in a Serb police crackdown in Kosovo – and insisted that Serb authorities were pressing for quick burials to hide evidence of police atrocities.

Last week's crackdown on the province's ethnic Albanian majority brought new international sanctions Monday and ignited Kosovo's biggest protest in a decade. About 50,000 people gathered in the provincial capital of Pristina, holding banners with messages pleading for help from foreign powers.

Portugal investigates use of illegal AIDS drug

LISBON, Portugal – Portugal's health minister ordered an investigation Monday into whether a clinic is testing a banned AIDS drug, using patients recruited through the Internet.

The daily newspaper Diario de Noticias had reported that the drug, Virodene P058, was being administered illegally by a Portuguese doctor.

Health Minister Maria de Belem Roseria told the Portuguese news agency Lusa that such use of the drug would be a crime that must be investigated.

"All legal measures are going to be taken," to ensure that anyone using it will be punished, she said.

The drug, which some University of Pretoria researchers claim reverses the effects of AIDS, also has been banned in South Africa.

That came after a committee of South African medical experts last year criticized the researchers for unauthorized human experiments, for using a toxic substance without proof it worked and for sidestepping peer review in seeking government funding.

The Medicines Control Council, which regulates medicine use and production in South Africa, said the drug – Virodene – contains dimethylformamide, an industrial solvent that can cause liver damage and possibly cancer.

The researchers were working for the company Cryopreservation Technologies.

A Diario reporter posed as the companion of an AIDS victim to gather information at a private clinic at Loures, 12 miles outside Lisbon, the capital.

The newspaper said a doctor there, Alvaro Alemao, confirmed he was using Virodene to treat HIV-positive patients of various nationalities. The story said 63 people were being treated without medical authorities being informed. Alemao denied the allegations.

National tipline protects children

ARLINGTON, Va. – Law enforcement and Internet leaders teamed up Monday to start a national tipline aimed at helping parents easily report attempts to abuse their children made by people the children encounter in cyberspace.

FBI Director Louis Freeh and America Online chief executive Steve Case were among the speakers at a news conference coordinated by the National Center for Missing & Exploited Children, which will staff the tipline. Also appearing was Sen. Judd Gregg, R-N.H., who, along with Sen. Ernest Hollings, D-S.C., helped arrange a 50 percent federal grant for the $600,000 project.

All agreed that as innocent children cruise the Internet, they are increasingly becoming prey for child pornographers and other exploiters.

The tipline contains a form that standardizes incident reporting and forwards the information to the FBI, the U.S. Customs Service, the U.S. Postal Inspection Service and local law enforcement officials.

"We always used to tell our kids, 'Don't talk to strangers when you're out playing in the playground. Don't accept candy from anybody who may offer it to you.' Today, the stranger, unfortunately, can come into the house," Gregg said.

The tipline, he said, will help parents serve as "lifeguards on the Internet."

Det. James McLaughlin of the Keene, N.H., police said he no longer spends his day in a patrol car. Instead, he sits in front of a computer monitor and investigates Internet exploitation.

McLaughlin said that when he first went into an online chat room pretending to be a 13-year-old girl, he got so many responses that his computer froze. He has since traced child pornography to Iceland, China and Canada. Since June, he has helped coordinate 60 arrests alleging Internet exploitation.

Kim sentenced for campaign fraud

SCANDAL: Congressman confined to his home for accepting illegal funds

By Michael Fleeman
The Associated Press

Rep. Jay Kim was sentenced Monday to two months home confinement under electronic monitoring for accepting and hiding illegal political contributions in what prosecutors called the largest case of campaign finance violations in U.S. history.

The three-term Republican lawmaker, who could have faced up to six months in jail for his guilty plea on misdemeanor charges, also was sentenced to one year probation, 200 hours of community service and a $5,000 fine.

"Thank God it's over," Kim said in a written statement, in which he apologized to his family, friends, voters and the judge. "I am truly sorry for my mistakes. All I can ask is for forgiveness."

In the packed courtroom, Kim showed no reaction to the sentence. He made a brief statement to the judge, saying, "I accept complete responsibility," and then stood at the lectern next to his lawyer as the sentence was announced.

The campaign committee for Kim, who is running for reelection despite the conviction and sentence, was ordered to pay a $170,000 fine and placed on five years probation. Under law, an organization, like an individual, can be convicted of criminal charges.

Kim's wife, June Oak Kim, who also pleaded guilty to misdemeanor charges, was sentenced to one year probation, fined $5,000 and 250 hours community service. She, too, made a brief statement, telling the court in a soft, trembling voice, "I'm very sorry, really sorry, for what has happened."

U.S. District Judge Richard A. Paez, who meted out the sentences, didn't explain in detail how Kim's home detention program would work, except to say the lawmaker could continue his "work duties" while under "electronic monitoring."

It wasn't known when the home detention would begin or what type of device would be used. It also wasn't known whether Kim would be allowed to travel to Washington. A probation officer said it would difficult to electronically monitor somebody with two homes at different ends of the country.

But Paez said, "I think it's doable."

The sentences capped the dramatic downward spiral for the Diamond Bar congressman, whose suburban 41st Congressional District east of Los Angeles includes parts of Los Angeles, Orange and San Bernardino counties.

Kim became the first Korean American congressman when he was elected in 1992, but he quickly was faced with allegations of campaign wrongdoing.

The Kims, who live in Diamond Bar about 30 miles east of Los Angeles, entered guilty pleas Aug. 11 to misdemeanor charges of accepting and hiding $230,000 in contributions. It is illegal for candidates to take money from foreign contributors or companies.

"This should have been the American success story, and it now amounts to a brief tragedy," said Kim's attorney, Tom Holliday, who urged the judge to spare Kim jail time so Kim wouldn't lose his congressional seat before the primary.

"Let the public decide it in terms of what they want to do with this man," said Holliday.

Kim did not comment after the sentencing. But in his written statement, read to reporters by his congressional press spokesman P.J. O'Neil, Kim said that while "I was in serious error," there are worse kinds of wrongdoing.

"I want the citizens in my district to know that this is not a case involving the misuse of public tax dollars, bribery, graft, threats, public corruption, vote buying, foreign influence, influence peddling or foreign agents," the statement said. "It is time to put this painful experience behind and move forward."

Federal prosecutor Stephen Mansfield, calling this the largest case of campaign violations in U.S. history, sought a jail sentence for Kim, both to punish Kim and to deter others.

Outside of court, Mansfield told reporters, "We accept the judge's decision and have respect for Judge Paez very much."

In his bid for a fourth term, Kim is running into resistance at home and in Washington. He faces his toughest GOP primary fight since he was elected, and in Washington, GOP colleagues have been suggesting he resign his seat.

Kim also is under investigation by the House ethics committee.

If the House determines that the congressman violated ethical standards, it could take action ranging from a letter of rebuke to expulsion, which has occurred only once in this century.

Also, Kim's wife told a Korean language newspaper that she has information about illegal campaign contributions not previously disclosed to investigators. She also accused her husband of extramarital affairs and said she may file for divorce.

Voters greeted by barrage of special-interest media

ELECTIONS: Outside groups hope to affect national campaigns

By Amanda Covarrubias
The Associated Press

SANTA BARBARA, – When Dale Odom went to the post office Monday she had 23 pieces of mail waiting for her. Twenty-one were campaign pamphlets.

When the Santa Barbara city employee stayed home sick last week, her recuperation was interrupted by a barrage of phone calls from political organizations.

They were asking her to vote – sometimes for a particular candidate in Tuesday's special congressional election. Welcome to election season 1998.

What Odom has been experiencing is a preview of what voters throughout the nation may face this year.

Special-interest groups based in Washington, D.C., vowed to influence this year's congressional elections and their first chance to do that was in the 22nd Congressional District spanning Santa Barbara and San Luis Obispo counties on the California coast.

Two candidates are vying to fill the seat left open by the death of the late Democratic Rep. Walter Capps. His widow, Lois, a former nurse and teacher, is running against conservative Republican Tom Bordonaro Jr., a two-term state Assemblyman.

"Outside interests are turning these into smear campaigns," Odom said. "Of all the commercials on TV, 90 percent don't have anything to do with the candidate. They're just a smokescreen. It makes you not want to vote for either one because you can't find the truth."

Among special-interest groups waging TV and radio ads in the Central California district were Americans for Limited Terms, U.S. Term Limits, the Campaign for Working Families, The National Abortion and Reproductive Rights Action League, and Americans for Job Security.

Sometimes it was clear which candidate each group supports: term limits advocates favored Capps, for example, and the Campaign for Working Families supported Bordonaro.

Sometimes the message was only implied: The abortion rights group ran ads that didn't mention Capps or Bordonaro but claimed to "unmask" a conservative activist behind other ads.

Advertising budgets ranged from $40,000 spent by Americans for Job Security to $230,000 spent by Americans for Term Limits.

What do the district's 352,000 voters really care about? The Santa Barbara News-Press and the San Luis Obispo Telegram-Tribune reported during the campaign that students who are at risk of dropping out of school.

The SRC also runs four retention programs: Mecha-Calmecac, created by MEChA, SPEAR, created by Samahang Pilipino, and ASP, created by African Student Union (ASU).

RAIN! has been able to stay strong despite the passing of Proposition 209. AISA and RAIN! members negotiated with the CRC (Campus Retention Committee) for eight months to ensure that the CRC could provide them retention funds while complying with the law.

"RAIN! is an excellent retention program that provides much-needed services and resources to Native American and non-Native American students on campus," said Natalie Stites, the president of AISA and vice chair of the CRC.

Stites led negotiations and remains responsible for hiring and reviewing the program through the RAIN! Review Committee.

RAIN! provides one mentorship program each quarter.

"RAIN! hopes that mentors and mentees will find dialogue to talk about their experiences as American Indians, to talk about the art and how it affects their lives," said Molly Springer, the director of RAIN!.

"We want them to communicate better and learn about each others' own personal histories," she said.

RAIN! also provides workshops every quarter. Each workshop has an academic, social, or cultural focus.

Last Tuesday, Jennifer Bazilus, RAIN!'s workshop coordinator and Jacob Goff, the secretary of AISA, ran a workshop on how to make God's Eyes. God's Eyes are colorful talismans originally made by the Pueblo and Mexican Indians, and are said to protect their owners from harm.

"RAIN!, along with the other student retention programs, are working very hard to provide a useful service to students trying to find their way through the university," Espinoza said.

Stites stresses that all Student Retention Center services – counseling, workshops, and mentorship programs – are open to all UCLA students. She said she hoped that other retention programs will develop the same way.

RAIN! serves the American Indian community by helping them get internships and utilize campus resources such as the Career and Expo Centers, and provides one-on-one academic counseling.

"Hopefully, RAIN! will expand its services not only to provide outreach but counseling for all American Indian students. AISA hopes to develop graduation, curriculum, and recruitment in an institutional manner much like RAIN! and our thirteenth annual pow wow, (which is currently) the largest student-initiated cultural event in the UC system," she said.

"The American Indian involvement is really excellent here," DeLeon said. "I think we have a lot of political support on campus. We have a very strong voice here for being such a small group."

"Europe, where are you?" one sign, written in English, demanded. "NATO, wake up!" another said.

Ethnic Albanians said they counted at least 52 corpses, including 13 children, 12 women and four elderly people, from the second of two police sweeps through an area west of Pristina last week.

"The Serb regime has committed an atrocity," said Enver Maloku, spokesman for the ethnic Albanians' Kosovo Information Center, adding that some bodies were so badly burned they could not be identified.

His account and casualty toll – which went down from 62 earlier Monday – could not be independently confirmed. The official Serb toll from last week listed 46 Albanians and six Serb policemen killed in both sweeps.

Maloku said some ethnic Albanians managed to view bodies of those killed when they were in the Pristina morgue. Police moved the bodies Sunday evening to the town of Srbica, the center of last week's crackdown, 25 miles west of Pristina, and patrolled the region in force Monday.

Still, an Associated Press Television crew and AP photographer got through to Srbica. In a rain-swept construction yard, dozens of bodies were lined up in two rows, heads and limbs protruding from a single long white sheet. A tractor lumbered in, dumping another corpse.

Police allowed the APTV crew to film only one body, which they claimed was that of Adem Jashari, who Serbs say was the leader of the Kosovo Liberation Army. A river of

OPEN LETTER TO THE UCLA STUDENT BODY

Dear Students:

I hope you enjoyed the 1997 Bruin Football season. We finished the year with a victory over Texas A&M in the Cotton Bowl and were Pac-10 co-champions ranked 5th in the nation. We are riding a 10-game winning streak, and this fall we have every intention of picking up where we left off. Our goal is to win every game and end the season as National Champions.

A major factor that could help push the Bruins to the top is you, the UCLA student body. The heart and soul of college football is the spirit displayed by students. We need your support in creating an energetic atmosphere in the Rose Bowl for all five home games. When the people in the seats are charged, the players on the field feed off your energy.

We are already working hard to prepare for the upcoming season. Our players and coaches are involved in an early-morning off-season conditioning program. I am proud of the efforts of our students-athletes, but what I am asking for now is that the student-fan become just as involved and dedicated. Spring ball starts on April 7th. Come out and watch the team on Spaulding Field. You will enjoy what you see and be on your way to becoming the best student-fan you can be.

The biggest commitment you can make as a student-fan is to purchase season tickets. I promise you five Saturdays of exciting football. Read the information below and buy your tickets now.

This is your team; this is your school -- let's do it together!

Sincerely,

Bob Toledo
Head Football Coach

UCLA
STUDENT SPORTS PACKAGES

Applications for 1998-99 Student Sports Packages (SSP) are now available at the Central Ticket Office (West Center) and Student Union Office (A-Level, Ackerman Union). Completed applications will be accepted beginning Monday, March 16 at 9:00 am at the Pauley Pavilion Ticket Office.

The first 500 applicants will receive a UCLA SSP for the 1998-99 sports year. All other applications received will be entered into a random draw to be held in late July.

Each SSP will admit the bearer to all five home football games, the men's basketball games listed under the plan that you choose and all other regularly scheduled home athletic events next year.

Applicants must use an official application in its original form. Each applicant may submit one application and request a maximum of one SSP. They are non-transferable. You must be a currently enrolled UCLA student, possess a UCLA student ID and ticket to get into the games.

Unsuccessful applications will be sent notification and a refund in the mail between August 19 and 28.

Because of the high demand for men's basketball tickets, we do not anticipate that tickets will be available to individual games next season.

Assuming UCLA is participating in a post-season football bowl game, or in the NCAA Basketball Tournament, only those students who apply for an SSP will be eligible to purchase those tickets.

Seating locations at UCLA venues are similar to last year. All student seating continues to be festival style general admission, except for the UCLA-USC football game where your prepaid priority number is exchanged for a reserved seat.

For more information on UCLA SSP policies and procedures and the random draw, pick up an application at the Central Ticket Office or Student Union.

Knowlton laced the food with a drug that made the rats sick; as a result the rats no longer were interested in the food.

Knowlton found that the rats go to the light regardless of the food, poisoned or not, because they have learned a habit via the basal ganglia.

Experiments involving humans with dysfunctional areas of the brain offered additional evidence.

People with damage to the hippocampus have trouble consciously learning new things. However, improving motor skills like their tennis stroke or golf swing is not a problem.

Likewise, these individuals perform well on a task which tests for the ability to develop unconscious habits.

"It's clear that these patients can learn some kinds of new things, and, thus other parts of the brain that are not damaged must have some kind of memory function," Knowlton said.

–In addition, Knowlton studied the abilities of patients with Parkinson's disease to perform simple memory and learning tasks.

These individuals, who normally have trouble with motor skills – muscle rigidity, slowness, and tremors – possess perfectly functional explicit or conscious memories.

"When given a memory test for words or pictures, they would do fine, unlike the amnesiacs who normally do poor on such tests," Knowlton said.

However, these same Parkinson's disease individuals perform very poorly on a test measuring their ability to develop unconscious habits, Knowlton said. They may remember the test, but they are never able to pick-up any habits.

As a result, Knowlton concluded the basal ganglia is an important structure for this kind of implicit learning. The basal ganglia appear to have memory functions that other brain structures are unable to take over, Knowlton said.

Researchers have been trying to use the intact habit system to help amnesiacs with a dysfunctional hippocampus to learn new things, but Knowlton said the process is difficult.

"I think it's hard, since as humans, we're so tied into our conscious memory and it's hard to kind of trust your gut feeling and instincts."

In terms of Parkinson's patients, Knowlton said the characterization of the different memory systems has helped psychologists understand that these people might have some problems that have previously gone unnoticed.

"Hopefully by elucidating the nature of this impaired learning, we may be able to suggest rehabilitation and assessment ideas, besides knowing more about what type of learning the basal ganglia mediate," said Jennie Sage, a third-year behavioral neuroscience graduate student, who worked on the project with Knowlton.

"Identifying brain systems responsible for memory could help us identify the molecular events that underlie memory storage, which could have implications for the development of treatments for diseases that effect memory like Alzheimer's," Knowlton said.

"Also, identifying the properties of different memory systems could lead to rehabilitation treatments that exploit other systems to make up for the lost system."

AFTERMATH

street. She is rebuilding, slowly and without government help.

"The river should have taken me, too," she said, tears streaming down her wrinkled face. "What can I do? It's bad how life treats you sometimes."

Below the hard-hit hillside communities, Acapulco remains the lively city of glossy brochures. Thousands still flock here each weekend for the beach, restaurants and nightlife, even though Guerrero state says tourism is off at least 15 percent this winter.

Bankers in town for a convention filled major hotels almost to capacity last weekend, and the Spring Break vanguard has already hit Acapulco's famous discos.

"I can't even tell a hurricane passed through," Tim Daley, a 29-year-old student from Bloomington, Ill., said over thumping techno music at the Palladium nightclub. "Then again, I haven't done much except drink, eat, sleep and drink some more."

But in the hills above the glitzy seaside avenue, damage is evident from the morning of Oct. 9, when hurricane-powered floodwaters tore through long-dry riverbeds, sweeping away cars, houses and at least 150 people.

"There's a sign down there: 'Acapulco is back on its feet,'" Ayala Martinez said. "I don't see it. Do they ever bring the tourists up here? Never."

Acapulco city spokesman Jose Luis Avila said the government made tourist areas its first priority because most residents survive on tourism.

"You can't do everything at once," he said. "And as for priorities, you have to rebuild the facade so we can all get back to work."

In the hillside Progreso neighborhood, piles of rubble still surround empty, half-tumbled houses with waterlines etched two-thirds of the way up their walls. Shoes, bottles and dog-eared books litter the dirt paths that have replaced washed-out roads.

The chronically flooded beachfront tunnel that President Ernesto Zedillo promised to close still fills with cars for morning rush hour, and the government says it will wait until low tourist season to build the bridge that will replace it.

And many Acapulco residents remain in mourning, still shedding tears over tattered photographs of their relatives and neighbors who were carried toward the sea in a fetid river of muck and death.

Among them is 30-year-old Alicia Alvarez Gutierrez, who has hung blown-up ID photos of her father, mother and sister above her bed. All four were swept into the reborn river, but Alvarez Gutierrez used a power cable to drag herself to safety.

She found her family's bodies a day later in the city morgue.

Since then, Alvarez Gutierrez has built a one-room structure to replace the house where her family lived. She is waiting for the government to help her move.

"I can't lie to you; I owe money," she said, sobbing. "Everything you see here I've done myself. What can I do? I'm alone and my family isn't with me anymore."

The government offered Alvarez Gutierrez a small rowhouse on the city's outskirts, but she would not accept the condition that she give up her own plot in exchange.

"I'm not going to lose the spot where my parents lived all their lives," she said. "I already lost my family, and I don't want to lose their land as well."

Avila, the government spokesman, said the city needs to move people away from riverbeds, something that if done long ago could have lessened the tragedy brought by Hurricane Pauline.

The resettlement is going slowly, he conceded, with only about 100 people having moved into new houses.

"Our lesson was very tough," he said. "And we have ourselves to blame for not having respected nature."

ing contractors to give work to minority subcontractors, or by other measures.

Six construction trade associations challenged the plans in 1994, saying they violated the Constitution's guarantee of equal treatment.

A federal judge ruled that Dade County did not provide enough evidence to support the need for the program. The 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals agreed, adding that the county improperly used such remedies as a "first resort" instead of considering neutral measures such as simpler bidding procedures.

The county's Supreme Court appeal addressed only the plan for black-owned businesses. It said they tend to be smaller and less experienced because of discrimination – not for race-neutral reasons.

The minority contractor group's separate appeal said the six trade associations should have been allowed to challenge only the parts of the county's programs that directly affected them.

Last November, Kim's campaign treasurer, Seokuk Ma, pleaded guilty to three charges of making and receiving illegal donations.

He was sentenced to five years of probation and fined $12,000. The felony charges were reduced to misdemeanors in exchange for his agreement to testify against the Kims.

The former treasurer testified he was merely following instructions. He said he often signed blank checks and deposit slips for Mrs. Kim.

voters were interested in the economy, education, crime, healthcare – including Medicare – jobs and Social Security.

Political experts don't know how the special-interest ads will affect Tuesday's election. Both candidates said they dislike outside groups coming into the district to try to influence the political agenda. But in the next breath they said there's nothing they can do about it.

Dorothy Newman, a Santa Barbara art teacher, said she's fed up with the whole thing.

"I think it's really a shame that these people have so much power to influence an election that they don't know anything about," Newman said. "The things on TV are the worst because they invade right into your home."

Nevertheless, Newman said she will vote, choosing Capps.

"I'm someone who believes in thinking for myself," she said.

Another voter, Republican John Hess, said he was not too bothered by the ad campaigns that flooded the airwaves, newspapers and mail.

"The ones I like, I'm for them," he said. "The ones I'm against, I don't want them here."

dried blood ran down his chest from an apparent throat wound.

Relatives were refusing to pick up the bodies, demanding autopsies by internationally appointed forensic experts, Maloku said, adding that Serbs were anxious to hold the funerals Tuesday because they were trying to cover up their alleged crimes.

Serb sources denied this, saying they wanted the funerals quickly only because the bodies – which gave off an overpowering stench – were starting to decompose. The Red Cross said Serbs rejected its request to view the corpses.

Across the Balkans, swift burial is traditional, usually a day after death.

Brushing aside foreign criticism, Serbs say they acted with justifiable force to stop the militant Kosovo Liberation Army, which has claimed 50 killings in the past 19 months, and crush attempts to win independence from Serbia, the dominant republic of Yugoslavia.

> Serbia clearly did not want violence on a day in which six foreign powers were meeting in London.

Kosovo is the heartland of Serbia's medieval empire, but ethnic Albanians outnumber Serbs 9-to-1 in the province. Serbs have vowed never to give Kosovo up.

For the first time since Kosovo was stripped of autonomy in 1989, police did not interfere with Monday's 50-minute protest in Pristina. The protesters flashed victory signs and held up signs in English, German and French to deliver their message to the world.

Riot squads sat in buses in side streets, and police with submachine guns and bulletproof vests formed cordons but did not break up the crowd. "We got orders from Belgrade not to beat them," said one policeman, who insisted on anonymity.

Serbia clearly did not want violence on a day in which six foreign powers were meeting in London to discuss a response to the crackdown.

In London, the United States, Britain, France, Germany, Italy and Russia agreed Monday to support an international arms embargo against Yugoslavia. They said President Slobodan Milosevic will face further sanctions unless special police units are withdrawn from Kosovo within 10 days.

The top U.S. envoy to the Balkans, Robert Gelbard, landed in Belgrade late Monday and was due in Pristina on Tuesday.

Ethnic Albanians reported that 25,000 people held peaceful protests elsewhere across Kosovo and said police beat demonstrators in Pec and another town – reports that Serb sources denied.

Yugoslavia's Tanjug news agency said protesters carrying pictures of Jashari and shouting "We want war!" opened fire on police in Pec, but no one was injured.

Kosovo's last peaceful mass demonstrations came in 1988, before Milosevic abolished autonomy. Serbs have ruled the province with a massive police and military presence ever since.

Last week's Serb police sweep left houses in ruins and forced thousands to flee. Media in neighboring Montenegro said 3,500 Albanians from Kosovo had arrived there in the past two days.

Marketing licensed items with the UCLA logo is a lucrative business.

LICENSING

National Sales Director, having a license to create merchandise with UCLA's trademark is advantageous in gaining college-age customers for the corporation.

"It's a very strong marketing opportunity from our point of view we reach kids at this stage of their lives," McMeekin said.

Holmes also said that ASUCLA does not give exclusive rights to its licensees to sell their products in the UCLA Store.

"I don't think anyone is excluded," she said. "There are competitive brands in the store."

All of these companies must comply with ASUCLA's anti-sweatshop policy, which states that no UCLA merchandise may be distributed by a company that employs sweatshop labor. In addition, all products sold in the UCLA Store must also comply with the policy.

"We sent out a notification to all the vendors who sell in our store," Eastman said.

She said that ASUCLA has received positive feedback regarding the policy.

"I'm very pleased with the successful implementation of the policy," Eastman said.

According to Holmes, many corporations are interested in marketing the UCLA trademark.

"We typically receive 10 applications per month from companies that have an interest in the UCLA trademark," Holmes said.

Potential licensees go through an application process, providing references and facing selection by a committee. ASUCLA will often contact other universities and organizations for which the company holds a license to find out if others have been satisfied by the company's use of their trademark. According to Holmes, about 25 to 30 percent of applicants are granted licenses.

"We want to know if they have the ability to market the product successfully," Holmes said.

She said that the committee also takes steps to make sure that the potential licensee is in compliance with the anti-sweatshop policy.

"We ask those types of questions to ensure that we are working with a company that is not doing those types of things," Holmes said.

If a licensee violates the terms of the contract or it is found that the firm violates an ASUCLA policy such as the anti-sweatshop policy, the contract can be terminated, although this has never happened.

"Obviously we have to take precautions when we evaluate a project," Holmes said. "We have provisions in our contracts to terminate a relationship."

"It's hard to anticipate what types of things will rear their head," she continued.

WOMEN

"Sometimes we need to catch ourselves," said Kristin Herdman, a fourth-year psychology student and peer counselor at the Women's Resource Center. "If we as women buy into the stereotypes, then men will too."

Herdman said that although she has not seen blatant sexism on campus personally, she does think that it happens.

"UCLA's diversity has a lot to do with it. I could speculate about other smaller colleges or in other parts of the country ..." she said. "But I know that being in the sciences, women can be intimidated in classrooms that are male-dominated."

Bloch points to workplace situations as blaring proof of inequality.

"There's still a great disparity between wages and opportunities," Bloch said, adding that many professions remain voluntarily segregated, with certain careers having unbalanced membership between genders.

She attributed much of this to the "glass ceiling," a term that describes women's real or perceived inability to advance. "It seems transparent," Bloch said. "It seems as though there's room to advance, but one often can't go beyond that point."

The glass ceiling is a phenomenon that has been discussed for years, and one issue that perpetuates it, Bloch said, is the issue of child-rearing responsibilities. In order for women to be equal in the work force, much has to change at home.

See WOMEN, page 13

"Child care is a big issue for women, even though it's gender neutral as far as kids are concerned. It's still assumed that it is primarily the woman's responsibility," Bloch said. "In an ideal society, men would participate a lot more."

Other issues that women face as hurdles are sexual violence and sexual harassment. Although they have received a lot of publicity, Bloch stresses that these problems affect and threaten men as well.

Even with the obstacles that face women in the workplace, at home and in society in general, Bloch is encouraged by the opportunities women enjoy today.

"Women have much more control over their lives than they ever had in the past. If the goal is to be independent on career, sexual relationships, all those things are a lot more free. There are costs, however. Society needs to make some adjustments."

She suggested that the federal government step in and help provide solutions for the problem of child care.

Because of the conservative political environment, however, national child care doesn't seem to be in America's near future. Although France and the Scandinavian countries have successfully established nationalized services, the U.S. political climate can't support one.

"The liberal progressive politics of the '60s and '70s aren't realistic today. Feminism had a big resurgence at a very idealistic time," Bloch said.

Despite slow movement at the federal level, many believe that individuals can help out. Bloch's advice to young women: "Figure out what what you want to do as individuals. Pursue what you need, push for positions of leadership. Be as foresighted as possible. And don't give up."

PROFESSOR

other teachers. He believes that the three professors were spearheaded by McInnes.

Wilson called the claims "complete fabrications."

Moreover, he claims that McInnes is actually a source of students' complaints. "Many of his students complain that they don't get their quota of lessons," Wilson said. He has also heard complaints that McInnes does not teach for the full lesson period and talks at length about his social life and career.

Wilson has also heard that McInnes would push students to buy a certain instrument so that he would receive a monetary kickback. He also claims that when McInnes took a sabbatical, he had an inadequate graduate student fill in for him.

"Every student was up in arms," Wilson said. "All the kids were begging me, literally, 'You got to teach me, you got to teach me.'"

McInnes would not return phone calls made by the Daily Bruin.

After the meeting to discuss leaving USC, Wilson went to his 16 students to discuss the situation. The students expressed to Wilson that they had no complaints about him whatsoever.

"No students went in to the dean's office, faculty went in with students' complaints," said Melissa Tong, a second-year violin performance student at USC. "No one had any complaints about him."

Wilson's students were as shocked as he was. In retaliation, over 20 students – some of whom weren't even Wilson's – wrote letters to the dean to express their feelings about the viola teacher.

A week after the letters were submitted to the dean, some music faculty alleged that Wilson had forced the students to write the letters, even threatening them with withheld grades.

Only days later, Wilson actually heard the news that he was fired. Because of his status as a part-time professor, he had few rights. However, Wilson is considering pursuing legal action.

"(The dean) had to stop the friction in the string section at the cost of losing me," Wilson said.

Apparently not all of the USC music department is against Wilson. "There is one faculty member who sees it completely plausible that it was a political move by another professor," Tong said.

After Wilson was fired, students became even more upset, visiting the dean and the chair of the string department in person. However, their efforts have been to no avail.

Wilson only has one way of explaining why USC has asked him to leave: somebody felt threatened.

"I am a player, and some people find that threatening," he said. "My reputation speaks for itself."

But apparently, Professor McInnes has felt threatened before. Wilson claims that during the past 10 to 12 years, two other viola teachers were pushed out in a similar fashion.

In addition to being a threat, Wilson further believes that bribery has been connected to his name.

Because of Wilson's position in the Los Angeles Philharmonic, free tickets are available to him, which oftentimes he likes to pass along to his students. Wilson says he wants to expose them to live music, as well as to hear many of the pieces they learn.

But as one USC professor interpreted it, Wilson was bribing his students with these tickets.

Like the other accusations, Wilson insists that this is simply not true. "I just try to do for these kids what wasn't done for me," he said.

The relationship between Wilson and his students goes far beyond the lessons he teaches them every week. Last Tuesday, 35 USC students discussed tactics to have Wilson reinstated. The students had their parents call, wrote letters to the university president, and an article about the scenario ran in last Thursday's Daily Trojan, USC's student newspaper.

Despite gallant efforts, Wilson realizes that nothing is going to happen. He will miss his job and admits that he will be losing a large chunk of money per year, but what Wilson considers the saddest thing is the loss to students. "It's the issue of somebody's ego, and not the kids," he said.

For example, Dmitri Kourka, an advanced study viola student in his first year, is considering leaving USC because of the decision about Wilson. Kourka moved to New York from Russia three years ago, and came to USC this school year just to study under Wilson. He is now thinking about returning to New York; although he has a scholarship at USC, because he cannot afford to take private lessons under Wilson.

Coincidentally, three days before Wilson was fired, he received an offer from UCLA for a part-time full professorship. Wilson has been teaching private lessons to UCLA students for 11 years.

Wilson has accepted the offer, which will go into effect by July 1. This would increase the amount of private viola lessons Wilson would be able to teach.

UCLA music department chair Jon Robertson is very excited about the addition, noting the tremendous amount of experience and abilities Wilson will continue to bring to UCLA. "It is hard to find people of his caliber," Robertson said. "It is our gain to have him."

Robertson is not familiar with all the details of what happened at USC, but calls the decision "very foolish."

Tour shows off college's opportunities

Thumbs up to the Mortar Board, which held "L.A. Teen Mentoring" in which 60 students from Charles Drew Middle School in Watts were given a tour of the UCLA campus and counseled about attending college and the benefits of attending university.

The members of the national college honor society showed the young students about the various activities and opportunities available in universities.

Mortar Board members are also active in helping out students of the school, with their after school program "Teamworks." During the school year, members volunteer for the 15-week leadership program.

The program engages the middle school students in community service activities and focuses on team-building and leadership.

While the adults help guide and manage the program, the students do the majority of the work, which has included raising money for a battered women's shelter and a recycling program.

Student loans may soon have lower interest

Thumbs up to President Clinton for proposing to reduce interest rates on college student loans.

Clinton says he will work to cut the interest rate on student loans from 7.8 to 7 percent, which can save students who take out loans up to $650 a year.

This would come as very welcome relief to many students across the nation, who take out loans to pay for college. This would ease the financial burden for millions of students each year.

But the proposal is not without its critics. Thomas Butts, associate vice president for government relations, said some lenders are concerned about the losses in profits that would result in the interest rate reductions.

Thumbs Up/Thumbs Down represents a majority opinion of the Daily Bruin Editorial Board. Send comments or suggestions to viewpoint@media.ucla.edu

It's time to look beyond the numbers

EDUCATION: There are no formulas that can solve life's problems

Daniel Inlender

I have never been that fond of numbers. Maybe my aversion is rooted in failed fifth-grade long division quizzes. Or it could even be that almost all of my academic success revolves around convincing professors I know a bunch of things that I don't. This, by the way, is a skill that can occasionally get you through a philosophy essay exam but pretty much leaves you screwed when the teacher reaches for the Scantron. (And is it just me, or did the professors here devise some sort of Ivy League multiple guess test to confuse you so much that by the end of the question you not only forget what they're asking, but if someone were to ask you your name, you'd stutter "... Bob?"

"The answer is

1. A
2. B
3. C
4. C&A's
5. Sometimes B but never A unless C and B add up to less than D
6. D
7. A, E, I, O, U and sometimes Y
8. None of the above, but all of everything else."

I think Jack Handey said it best in one of his SNL musings: "Instead of having 'answers' on a math test, they should just call them 'impressions,' and if you got a different 'impression,' so what, can't we all be brothers?" Anyone want to take bets as to how many math students blitz me derogatory comments concerning my mother and animal husbandry after reading this paragraph?
